Let me say to the Senator, and he is an old hand at these debates on the naval appropriation bills, that I do not think it is quite fair for him, in talking about the construction of the Navy and the building of ships in it or the repairs of ships, to invoke the total aggregate of $385,000,000 that has been appropriated in nearly twenty years. That is the entire appropriation for the whole establishment.

Mr. BECK. I so said.

Mr. HALE. It was enormously increased during the war. We found upon our hands as a legacy of the war an immense naval establishment, both of officers and men. Everything had been got up to a high pressure, to extravagant rates. The $385,000,000 to which he refers, and which he seems to intimate has not been spent properly, covers everything that has ever been expended on the entire naval establishment for all that time. You will not find a great naval power in the world that has got along with anything like that expenditure. Great Britain does not hesitate to spend three times as much yearly for the running of her naval establishment as we do. It is a fact of history, which we ought to have no pride in contemplating—we ought to be mortified when we look at it—that during all those years we have not made, as the Senate is asked now to make, specific appropriations for the building of new ships. The day never will come, if we have a navy, that we shall not have to expend twelve, fifteen, or twenty million dollars yearly, of which not a dollar should go into a new ship or into its repair. You can not have a navy without paying for it. You can not have an army without paying for it. The Senator might as well say that not a dollar had been profitably expended upon the Army, where the appropriations were doubled from year to year and the Army never increased, and might intimate that the money had gone wrong because we have spent over $400,000,000 in the Army in that time, when everybody ought to know, and none better than he, that it is for the purpose of the running expenses of the Army, and so this has gone for the running expenses of the Navy.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I was tempted to make the remarks I did because of the statement made by the Senator from Maine that we had a constantly dwindling Navy which was a disgrace to us, as though the Congress of the United States had done nothing to bring it up, when I showed by the amounts of money appropriated to that Department, together with all the old material and ships sold for vast sums, that Congress had appropriated money enough to have given us a very good navy to-day, not equal at all to that of the great powers of Europe who are almost constantly at war with each other. And when the Senator made the additional remark that we could not stand by and see the commerce of this country transferred to other peoples, I think I agree with him in that, and if there is anything more humiliating than the condition of the American Navy it is the condition of the American mercantile marine, which I hope in a few days the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and others will do something to restore.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], the colleague of the gentleman who is in charge of this bill, the other day laid the shipping bill before us, and I felt then the humiliation quite as great as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] now feels about the Navy, when the Senator's colleague [Mr. FRYE] said, relative to his bill, this:

The first section of the bill touches the provision relating to officers of American ships. The law as it stands to-day requires that all officers of vessels of the United States shall be citizens of the United States, and provides a very heavy penalty of 50 cents a ton on a vessel for a violation of this law. It was a good law when it was enacted, when nearly all the sailors on board the ships were American sailors, and many of them fit to be made officers; but to-day, with 95 per cent. of the sailors foreigners, it is not a good law and works a great injustice very frequently. The bill reported by me provides that under certain circumstances the officers, other than the captain, may be foreign rather than American citizens.

When you contemplate the fact that less than 16 per cent. of the carrying trade of this country is done by the American merchant marine, that not a steamship crosses the Atlantic Ocean from the great port of New York that is not in the hands of foreigners, that England carries 60 per cent. of all the trade of the world to-day and has 90 per cent. of her sailors her own citizens, is it not a humiliating fact that we, with our insignificant little 16 per cent. of our carrying trade, with hardly any but the lowest grade of vessels, have only 5 per cent. of the sailors upon them our own citizens? Nobody is humiliated about that, but we are humiliated that we have not a navy to protect—what? We have no commerce to protect; we have taken no pains to have any commerce to protect; and what I am mentioning is a humiliation that should be more sensibly felt by the representatives of the American people than the want of a navy for grandeur, with nothing to protect, when you are only spending money, as we have done, large sums, with not a first-class ship since 1868 and only three of the second class, the Trenton, the Omaha, and the Vandalia, now in commission, and the remainder of them are twelve or thirteen third-rates—things not fit to go anywhere.

I am not going into the discussion; I do not understand the question well enough for that; but I thought it was proper to ask a few questions and to make these remarks suggested by some statements made by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, I had the honor yesterday to ask the privilege of introducing some amendments to this bill, which have been printed. I ask to have the amendments read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the Senator from New Jersey may be reported for information. The question, however, is on the amendments reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, which take precedence of the Senator's amendments.

Mr. HALE. I presume there will be no objection to the amendments offered by the committee.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will wait until they are disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendments reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Let them be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the committee will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 12, after the word "and," strike out "two" and insert "one;" in line 13, after "light," strike out "gunboats" and insert "gunboat;" and in the same line, after "tons," strike out "each" and insert "and one gunboat, not to exceed nine hundred tons, to be built on plans and specifications to be furnished by the Admiral of the Navy, and under his supervision and directions, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Navy;" so as to make the section read:

That the President is hereby authorized to direct the construction of seven steel vessels for the Navy of the United States, as recommended in the report of the naval advisory board dated October 25, 1883, and in the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy of December 1, 1883, as follows: One cruiser of 4,500 tons displacement, one cruiser of 3,000 tons, one dispatch-vessel of 1,500 tons, two heavily armed gunboats of 1,500 tons each, and one light gunboat of 750 tons, and one gunboat, not to exceed 900 tons, to be built on plans and specifications to be furnished by the Admiral of the Navy, and under his supervision and directions, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If I understand the reading of that amendment it is one offered in committee and agreed to by the committee unanimously. In short, so far as I am concerned, I think it is about the only thing in the bill on which I am in agreement with the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. Shall I understand the Senator to say that his amendment was agreed to in committee?

Mr. MCPHERSON. No; I speak of the amendment the committee have offered which has just been read. The purport of the amendment is to give the Admiral of the Navy the opportunity of furnishing plans upon which one of the gunboats is to be constructed. The Admiral is a distinguished naval officer. He has given perhaps as much study and attention to the question of the designing and construction of gunboats as any man in this or any other country. He has been assisted by the most competent engineering authorities, and the committee thought it wise that the Admiral should have an opportunity of putting into shape and actual operation a real gunboat containing the results of his investigation and study. So far as that amendment is concerned, I fully agree with the committee, and am only surprised that it agrees with me, as I remember I had the honor of offering that amendment in committee.

Mr. HALE. I hope and believe that there will be no objection to this amendment. The committee did feel that Admiral Porter, by his long service, his own merit, his intense interest in the navy and in the rebuilding of it, should be allowed a departure from the general rule applied to this bill, and that one of the ships should be built under his eye and upon his plan. He has certain views, theories, and beliefs, and it was thought best to allow those to be put in form in one of those ships. I hope the Senate will bear that in mind and adopt the amendment, also bearing in mind that the Admiral in his testimony gave the benefit of his large experience and knowledge and interest in the Navy in favor of the other ships that the Senator from New Jersey seeks to strike out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is amendment on the reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I now offer my amendment.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is in line 4, to strike out the word "seven" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four."

In lines 9, 10, and 11 strike out the following:

One cruiser of 4,500 tons displacement, one cruiser of 3,000 tons, one dispatch-vessel of 1,500 tons.

Add as a new section the following:

SEC. 3. That the gunboats, steel ram, and torpedo-boats authorized to be built under sections 1 and 2 of this act shall be built under complete plans and specifications to be furnished by the Navy Department, except the gunboat, to be built on plans to be furnished by the Admiral of the Navy; and such building shall be under contracts with the lowest responsible bidder or bidders, made after at least sixty days' advertisement, published in five of the leading newspapers of the United States, inviting proposals for building said vessels, subject to all such rules, regulations, superintendence, and provisions as to bonds and security for the due completion of the work as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe; and no such vessel shall be accepted unless completed in strict conformity with the contract, and no contract shall be made until all the general plans, detailed or working drawings, and specifications for the complete work be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the first amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, in line 4 to strike out "seven" and insert "four."

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, it was my intention some time during the discussion of these matters relating to the increase of the Navy to present the whole subject of naval administration in this country for the past twelve or fifteen years; but I have not the physical strength to-day to engage in such a discussion, nor is it necessary for the purposes I now have in view, but I promise it later.

I am as earnest in my efforts to secure good vessels for the United States Navy as any member of the Senate. I only object to the reckless method by which it is sought to be accomplished. I am in favor of appropriations of money, liberal appropriations, looking to an increase of the Navy upon some well-settled and established rules and principles; but I do object to going further with experiments until they have approached something near a certainty. I still object, as I did last year when the subject was under discussion by the Senate, to destroying in the manner it is now being done the old wooden vessels of the Navy, many of them still excellent ships, until some suitable substitute in the shape of new iron vessels shall be first found to take their place.

Mr. BUTLER. If it will not disturb my friend from New Jersey, I should like to ask him what substitute he would suggest for the proposition which has been made with practical unanimity, as I understand, by the advisory board?

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Senator will only have a little patience I think I shall be able to tell him; at least I have started out to do so.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought perhaps he was going from that subject, and I should like to hear him upon it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I rose for the purpose of telling the Senator, and if I fail in making him understand me then his question will be a very proper one.

As I said, Mr. President, I objected last year when the so-called naval bill was under discussion to limiting the amount of money which could be expended by the Secretary on a wooden ship to 20 per cent. of its appraised value. What has been the result? Since we passed that bill last year there have been stricken from the Naval Register, as stated by the Secretary's report, forty-eight ships. We had some one hundred and thirty ships in all in the American Navy, and of that number the Secretary of the Navy, under the power given him under the 20 per cent. restriction clause, has stricken forty-eight from the Naval Register; they do not appear to-day as ships of the American Navy. What has been done with them? Appraisements were made and the vessels have been sold for a sum of money in some cases considerably in advance of the appraisement. That does not often happen. It does not often happen that the Government or an individual receives very much more for the sale of property than the value placed upon it by the owner. In this case the Government has received more from the sale of the old vessels than it thought them worth itself. Twenty-four of these vessels were appraised at $271,300. They sold at an advance of $36,973 above the appraisal, and sold to a ring of speculators, I hear, who made their own terms. I have heard before of naval rings, but always supposed they dealt only with living things—appropriations and the like—but it seems they follow an old hulk to its death.

Just here let me call the attention of the Senate to our present condition. We have eliminated forty-eight of our wooden vessels from the Navy by a simple order of the Secretary. How is it as to the rest? In the investigation by the Committee on Naval Affairs of certain distinguished gentlemen who represent the naval affairs of this Government, I find in the testimony of Mr. Wilson, the chief constructor of the Navy, a gentleman who was called to that place on account of his ability and his thorough knowledge of the matters relating to that Department, who is the present chief naval constructor—Mr. Wilson, when asked the question as to what he thought of the 20 per cent. restriction clause, his reply was that very many vessels under the 20 per cent. clause that ought to be improved, that ought to be rebuilt and repaired, were necessarily thrown aside. He stated the limit was much too low. In short, its results were a wanton destruction of property.

Let us take the case of the Ticonderoga, the vessel in which Admiral Shufeldt three or four years ago took his journey around the world. The vessel was rebuilt at a very great expense in 1878, five years ago. In 1881 she was again repaired. The estimate made to-day by the Navy Department, and by competent authority, goes to show that we could not duplicate that ship for less than $500,000. That vessel, among others, is condemned. She lies to-day in one of the navy-yards of the country with an appraised value of $24,000 put upon her, when the estimate for her repair, as we find in the report of Mr. Wilson, chief constructor of the United States Navy, and the chief adviser in that department of the Secretary of the Navy, to make her a good ship for fifteen years is about $90,000, just, as he states in his testimony, 1 or 2 per cent. above the limit, and therefore she must be condemned. Let me read from his testimony:

In the case of the Ticonderoga —

He speaks of two ships, the Monongahela and the Ticonderoga—

In the case of the Ticonderoga—and I lay some great stress on those two vessels—she was substantially a new ship, if I recollect aright, in 1879 or 1880, when Admiral Shufeldt took her and made his cruise on the African coast. That ship, when she came home with some new streaks of wales in her, some few other defective portions of her made new, would have been available for another cruise immediately, say in three months' time, but she lay some time out of commission, and when finally surveyed she came within one-half of 1 per cent. of the law. I might have stretched my conscience enough to have repaired her, but I said no. I know from experience that the moment you opened that ship you would find the defects greater than the board have ascertained, and she would probably cost from 21 to 22 per cent.

I think it will clearly be seen that the attempt made last year under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy to absolutely blot out of existence everything in the shape of a naval establishment, costing millions, tens of millions, and hundreds of millions, as stated by the Senator from Kentucky; to blot it out for the purpose of giving room and make necessity to build new ships under a favorite contractor, has found its complete realization.

What more does Mr. Wilson say? He speaks of no less than four or five more ships now arriving or soon to arrive, all of which he says will be retired under this law, namely:

There is the Pensacola, on her way home from the Pacific; the Hartford will soon start home; the Lackawanna; the Tennessee. None of these ships can be repaired under that law. The Powhatan could not be again repaired, and about six years will wipe out the entire navy of wooden ships under the present 20 per cent. law.

I simply place this fact on record now in order that I may impress upon the Senate that the whole effort, the whole plan under the administration of the present Secretary of the Navy, is to have the opportunity of building new ships and not to preserve the old ones even where they are worthy of preservation. Take the case of the New York, which lies to-day in the navy-yard at Brooklyn. That ship is a live-oak ship almost entirely completed so far as her hull is concerned; her boilers are in place and part of her machinery has been put in, and Mr. Wilson states in his testimony that at a cost of $400,000 that ship for fifteen or twenty years, if completed, will be equal in military efficiency and in every other respect for a successful naval vessel to the most costly ship which the new advisory board have recommended to build, I mean the Chicago, and that at a cost of about one-quarter what it will cost to build the Chicago. In other words, a ship now in process of construction which has cost already a large sum, and which can be made equal to the best steel ship recommended to be built, for $400,000 is to be thrown away, and make room for the new ship and the favorite contractors.

I might talk about other ships. I only speak of these cases to show that under the 20 per cent. limit which was asked for by the Secretary of the Navy last year, and which was granted by Congress, we are annihilating the present naval establishment of the country. In lieu thereof we are authorizing the President to build a certain number of steel ships. The Chicago was designed and is under construction by the naval advisory board. The Boston and Atlanta, two ships of a smaller class, were also put in place, and the Dolphin, which is to be used, as I understand, as a kind of waiter upon the Admiral. Speaking of the Dolphin, Admiral Shufeldt says "she is simply a yacht." "But," says the Admiral, "if you amplify her and make her a little larger and give her a heavier gun, she becomes a commerce-destroyer." This statement itself demolishes all further criticism.

The objection that I have to duplicating these ships is not an objection born in my own brain; it is one that comes to me with irresistible force from distinguished officers who are better competent to deal with this question than any members of the Senate possibly can be. The chief constructor of the Navy did not agree with the conclusions of the advisory board, and so stated to the Secretary. The chief engineer of the Navy Department disagreed with the conclusions of the advisory board, and so stated to the Secretary in a letter which has been printed and is to be found upon the desks of all Senators.

There were the two advisers of the Secretary in conflict with the recommendations of the advisory board; but still the Secretary signed the recommendations of the board, and the ships are now under construction.

Here is a report also of Mr. Isherwood, one of the most distinguished officers in the American Navy, or in fact in his department in any navy of the world. He takes up the Chicago, the Boston, the Atlanta, and the Dolphin, and he gives reasons, and the very best of reasons, why no more ships of these kinds should be built. In short, the ships are condemned by almost everybody with respect to two or three phases of their structure. The Admiral of the Navy, Admiral Porter, thought that the ships should have full-sail power. They have half-sail power. Other distinguished naval officers thought the ships should be sheathed, and the report of the first advisory board created under Secretary Hunt made their recommendation in favor of both full-sail power and sheathing the ships.

I will read for the information of the Senate some of the criticisms made by Mr. Isherwood, the distinguished engineer, upon the designs and structure of some of these ships. I will first take the Dolphin. What does Mr. Isherwood say of her?

The Dolphin is not available for any military use, being merely a steam yacht, designed apparently only for the use of an admiral commanding a squadron, her elegant and spacious accommodations and high speed rendering her convenient for such purpose. She does not therefore fall into the category of a naval cruiser at all, and the only question in relation to her is whether so expensive a vessel to make and maintain, and so useless a one, is desirable in a navy that is destitute of fighting ships. As the appropriations for naval vessels are likely to be very limited, and as the cruisers now belonging to the Navy or likely to belong to it in the near future are very few, there can be no doubt that no more yachts of the Dolphin type, or indeed of any type, should be constructed for many years to come, if ever.

I strike out in my amendment the Dolphin, as we need fighting vessels just now more than we do pleasure yachts for the Admiral. Mr. Isherwood speaks of the Chicago. I shall presently read his criticism upon that ship. The Dolphin is a vessel designed, as Mr. Isherwood says in his statement, to run backwards and forwards for the use of the fleet-officer. With only three or four vessels to be built, the first thing that the advisory board recommends to do is to build, and do build, a vessel expressly for the fleet-officer to run backwards and forwards at an expense of $400,000. A costly toy. I understand her to be a vessel with machinery and other features very similar to the steam vessels that now run up and down the coast, except that she is to have more speed, so that in case the Admiral is attacked there will be some chance for him to get away.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator from New Jersey will not be interrupted by my asking him a question I desire to ask him this: Under our tariff laws we provide that articles imported for the use of the United States shall be free of duty, and the Supreme Court has decided that property imported for the use of the Government is not liable to duty. Now, we have navy-yards. We have a right to bring in guns, compound engines, and everything to be used in and shipped to these navy-yards without paying duty, and can there put them into our own ships. Instead of that, we contract with Mr. Roach or somebody else to build them; and are not their contracts based upon the material at an average of 40 per cent. duty? Why should we make contracts with men paying an average duty of 40 per cent. upon the materials when by law we have the right to bring the materials in free and pay no duty?

Mr. McPHERSON. I can answer the honorable Senator. It is for the very reason and for the simple reason that the navy-yards of this country are used more for political than for naval warfare. I suppose it would cost us perhaps 40 per cent. more if we undertook to build these same ships in the navy-yards. I have no doubt under the present administration of the Navy it would cost perhaps that much more. At all events John Roach gets the contracts and the navy-yards are idle. It is for somebody's interest that he should have them; perhaps the Government's interest; I do not know myself.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill provides, as I understand, that these ships must be built in the navy-yards, under the direction of the President: "The President is hereby authorized to direct the construction of seven steel vessels for the Navy of the United States."

How can he direct the construction in private yards?

Mr. McPHERSON. As claimed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the construction of these ships will come under the act of last year as to all the methods employed. What are these methods? You will find that the Secretary of the Navy is required under the act to—

Utilize the national navy-yards, with the machinery, tools, and appliances belonging to the Government there in use, in the building of said ships or any parts thereof, as fully and to as great an extent as the same can be done with advantage to the Government.

The Secretary of the Navy claims that it can not be done with advantage to the Government; that an appraisement having been made by the authority provided—to wit, the Secretary—an estimate having been made as to the cost of building these ships, private contractors having offered to do it less, it became his duty under the same law to contract to have it done; and there is a provision in the same law permitting him to contract for the building of ships. In short, his power is unlimited; and if he needs more he is sure to get it.

Now, as to the Chicago. I say there should be no more Chicagoes built until the expiration of that period of time, which will be about the 1st day of January next, when the ship is completed under the contract, and the ship can be tested both as to her hull and her machinery and as to her powers as a war ship. An abundance of time will then be left after that test is made to give Congress an opportunity of making a suitable appropriation of money to duplicate that ship if she is deemed worthy of being duplicated.

But no; the plan is to destroy the wooden ships, to lay down the keels of as many new vessels as you can without one of them being tested to know whether when she is completed she will sink or swim. That is the policy of this administration. There is no naval power on earth, no Senator can name one, that has ever undertaken to build a great vessel and build her upon plans new and untried, an experiment, so to speak, that has ever undertaken to repeat the experiment until the test of actual experience was first applied to the actual ship.

Now what does Mr. Isherwood say about the Chicago?

First. She is too small for a first-class cruiser by about 1,500 tons displacement.
Second. She is not wooden sheathed and coppered.
Third. Her machinery is inefficient in type and will fail at high speed.

There is but one ship to-day in the known world, and that is an old ship running between New York and New Orleans, that has an engine of the class and type that it has been decided to put in the Chicago. Mr. Shock, in his criticism upon the engines of the Chicago in the letter that he wrote to the Secretary of the Navy, said that he disapproved of putting in an experimental engine in a ship costing so much money, and he refused to concur in the action of the advisory board touching the machinery in that ship. Mr. Isherwood goes on to say further:

Her speed will be entirely too little and her endurance much too small.

Mr. MILLER, of California. From whom is the Senator reading now?

Mr. McPHERSON. I am reading from Mr. Isherwood.

Her services in war will be limited to our own coasts, where she will not be needed, instead of abroad, in the destruction of an enemy's commerce.

He speaks also of the Boston and Atlanta in the same terms, condemning the vessels. I have read criticism after criticism almost daily in the public press emanating from the highest engineering authority in England, discussions taking place among English naval engineer officers as to the impolicy of placing such machinery in the Chicago as has been determined on by the advisory board, and predicting for that ship an entire failure. But, says the honorable Senator from Maine, the advisory board and the Secretary say otherwise. Well, who constitute the advisory board, and what claims has it to distinction? Subtract the head of the board, as he lays no claim to be either a naval constructor or an engineer, and you have not even a respectable tail left either as to ability or experience.

I am not an engineer, neither am I a naval constructor; I know nothing of the structure of ships; but I am not prepared to fly in the face of the highest living testimony, and I think no man will have the audacity to deny that there is to-day no single living representative who in his particular sphere stands higher as a competent authority than Mr. Isherwood. Mr. Wilson had been called to the head of the Bureau of Construction of the Navy on account of his ability and his knowledge of all the details of that department. Mr. Shock had been called to the head of the Bureau of Engineering for like reasons, and they all concur in condemning the ships.

Now, what do I ask, Mr. President? I have offered an amendment which says to the Senate of the United States: "Stop; build no more Chicagoes, no more Bostons and Atlantas, no more Dolphins, until those we have now under construction, and which will be completed by the 1st day of January next, shall be tested," and then if they prove equal to all that the friends of these ships claim for them I shall be found among the first to vote an appropriation of the requisite sum to build other vessels of the same kind. But I do propose by my amendment that more gunboats may be built at once. The four gunboats proposed to be built under this bill, and which I do not disturb in my amendment, will cost, I suppose, a less amount of money than one Chicago. They will cost not more than $250,000 each, or $1,000,000 in all, and I have no objection to trying experiments with a boat no more costly than that. But these are not experiments. They have proven to be a valuable aid in the naval service of every country, and I for one, as I desire some increase of the Navy, propose that the increase shall be in the right direction; that no more millions of dollars shall be thrown away uselessly in the naval establishment of the country.

Again, if there is any sincerity on the part of the Senators who seem to favor this bill they certainly would at least ask that an appropriation of money be first made and applied to the completion of the five iron monitors which have been for the past eight years under construction by the Government; but we do not hear a word about them. A great cry is raised as to the immediate needs of the United States Navy; that the German navy is already at our door. The five monitors, which can be completed within the next six months and given to the service of the Government, are not mentioned at all. We have just paid a bill of $74,000 on account of each of these five ships for storage-room in the dock-yards of private ship-builders. Three hundred and seventy thousand dollars has been paid for storage-room. The ships have been under construction for eight long years, and all they need to-day to complete them is to mount their turrets and place their batteries in position. But no; the purpose is to start as many ships as we can and complete them when we may. Once started the contractor at least is safe. Under the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy it will cost $4,000,000 to complete the five monitors; under the contract price for the ships now under construction it will take two millions and a half to complete their construction; in all, in round numbers, say $7,000,000, which if completed this year would give to the country nine ships more than we now have. But the Senator from Maine prefers seven more started and none completed, for he himself can scarcely believe this Congress will be so profligate with the public money.

Now, Senators, how much money do you wish to appropriate? Do you wish to appropriate fifteen or twenty million dollars a year, or do you wish to appropriate only such amount of money as can be judiciously and honestly applied, if such a thing is now possible? It seems to me when we undertake to vote millions out of the public Treasury we ought to know for what purpose they are to be applied.

Mr. HALE. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from New Jersey has asked Senators if they wish to appropriate $15,000,000 or so of money in one year for the Navy. Does he not know that all of the money that will be required for the next year, if this bill is passed, for its purposes and for the completion of the four ships now building and also for the completion of the monitors, will be but $6,552,177? That is the fact. Instead of its being $15,000,000 or $12,000,000 or $10,000,000, the aggregate is only the sum I have named, a little more than six and a half million dollars. That includes the appropriations under this bill for the next year; that includes the finishing of the vessels begun last year; and that includes all the money that can be spent or that will be asked for the next year upon the double-turreted ironclads, which the Senator himself, I believe, is in favor of finishing. For all these purposes only six and a half million dollars will be required.

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not know on whose authority I am to rely, whether that of the honorable Senator from Maine or that of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HALE. I am going on the Secretary of the Navy's exhibit of these different needs for the different ships.

Mr. McPHERSON. I quote from page 31 of the report of the Secretary of the Navy, in which he finds it necessary to ask Congress for $7,449,581.62; that is for completing the new steel cruisers, completing the four double-turreted monitors, together with a few items of expense—tinkering the hulls of the New York and Mohican, and some pretense in other directions.

It is well known that there are several of the wooden ships that ought to be repaired; and certainly if the Secretary of the Navy does his duty to the country they will be repaired after Congress releases him, as I hope it will, from the 20 per cent. restriction and leaves the whole matter open. There is another sum of money which must be appropriated for that. Then, with the $7,449,581.62 for the purposes mentioned and the five or six million dollars required to construct the Senator's ships which he proposes to build, it will amount to a vast sum in all. I take it it makes but very little difference whether we contract this year to build a ship which can not be completed until next year. The contract is the same and the obligation of the Government under the contract is the same whether the vessel contracted for is built in one year or in two. I propose to have the Senate vote intelligently on the question. I want to abandon at once the idea of going on in this line at present, I do not say forever, because if these ships prove to be what the advisory board and their friends say they will, and what other gentlemen far more distinguished in their respective spheres say they will not—if, I repeat, they prove to be successful ships, there will be abundant time for the Congress of the United States to undertake to duplicate them at the next session; and that they are to be duplicated by this bill I have the authority of the honorable Secretary of the Navy himself. Let me read his answers to some questions put by myself:

Senator McPHERSON. Do I understand that the cruiser called for here is of the same class as the Chicago?
Secretary CHANDLER. Yes, sir.
Senator McPHERSON. And also one cruiser of 3,000 tons of the class of the Boston and Atlanta?

Secretary CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

Senator MCPHERSON. You make provision here for two heavy gunboats and two light ones, I see, and a dispatch vessel. One of the boats you are now building is a dispatch-boat, is it not?

Secretary CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

Senator MCPHERSON. Is the dispatch-boat here provided for similar in character to the one now being constructed?

Secretary CHANDLER. It is proposed that it shall be the same. The proposition of the bill is that the Chicago, and the Boston and Atlanta (which are alike) and the Dolphin be duplicated. The board recommend, I think, two vessels of the type of the Boston and Atlanta, but I see the bill only provides for one.

Now, I move to strike that all out of the bill, so as to proceed simply and solely to build four gunboats, which Admiral Porter says are worth more than the Chicago for both offensive and defensive purposes. Build, if you please, your steam-ram and your torpedo-boat. I have no objection to experiments. If the gunboats be an experiment, if the ram and the torpedo-boats be experiments, I have no objection to experiments of that character; but I do object to repeating experiments until they reach the position of almost absolute certainty, especially where millions are involved.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I shall not occupy the floor long; but I think it is due to the committee and due to the Senate, and in fact due to the Senator from New Jersey, that some of the statements which have been made be corrected, which I shall attempt to do from the record.

The Senator says that the effort of the Navy Department is, to use his own expression, to wipe out the wooden ships of the Navy. I am not here to defend the Navy Department or to make any attacks upon it, but I think it is always proper to be just. I find in the naval appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, the following provisions of law upon the subject of the 20 per cent. allowance for repairs:

It shall also be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, to cause to be examined by competent boards of officers of the Navy, to be designated by him for that duty, all vessels belonging to the Navy not in actual service at sea, and vessels at sea as soon as practicable after they shall return to the United States, and hereafter all vessels on their return from foreign stations, and all vessels in the United States as often as once in three years, when practicable; and said boards—

"Said boards," mind you, Mr. President—shall ascertain and report to the Secretary of the Navy, in writing, which of said vessels are unfit for further service, or, if the same are unfinished in any navy-yard, those which can not be finished without great and disproportionate expense, and shall in such report state fully the grounds and reasons for their opinion. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy, if he shall concur in opinion with said report, to strike the name of such vessel or vessels from the Navy Register and report the same to Congress.

I submit in view of that provision of law that if anybody has been inclined to wipe out the wooden ships of the Navy it has been the Congress of the United States. I find in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, the following provision of law under the head of "Bureau of Construction and Repair" as a proviso to the appropriation:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs, to be appraised by a competent board of naval officers, shall exceed 20 per cent. of the estimated cost, appraised in like manner, of a new ship of the same size and like material: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall deprive the Secretary of the Navy of the authority to order repairs of ships damaged in foreign waters or on the high seas, so far as may be necessary to bring them home.

There is the authority, as I take it, under which the Secretary of the Navy has acted in striking these forty-eight ships from the roll.

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I ask the Senator a question in that connection?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Under that provision of law, will the Senator tell me by what process the ship Ticonderoga claimed by those competent to judge to be worth, and which cost, $600,000, has been condemned, as I understand, and an appraised value of $24,000 fixed upon her?

Mr. BUTLER. I am really not able to answer the Senator that question, but I will refer him to the board of naval officers appointed by the Secretary of the Navy. I take it for granted that their written report, which the law requires to be made, will give that information.

Mr. HALE. After the Senator is through I will give the information desired. I will not interrupt him now.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very glad if the Senator from Maine would give the information now, because I do not happen to have it.

Mr. HALE. Following up the provision fixing the 20 per cent. limit, which has just been read by the Senator from South Carolina, Congress, not the Secretary of the Navy, provided in section 5 of the deficiency appropriation act of March 3, 1883, specific methods that the Secretary of the Navy should pursue in order to get at a vessel and strike her from the rolls and sell her. These provisions are all found in section 5 of that act. They are very particular, providing everything that shall be done before a sale is made.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The Senator had better have them read.

Mr. HALE. In the regular appropriation act for the year before it is provided that the Secretary of the Navy shall first call an examination and strike the vessel from the rolls before he sells. The provisions for selling are contained in section 5 of the act I referred to. In a moment I will ask the Secretary to read that section. As to the Ticonderoga, one reason why she was put into the category referred to by the Senator from New Jersey is that she is one of the oldest ships in the Navy. She was built in 1862; she cost $474,000; and we have actually expended on that old wooden ship in repairs up to the present day $838,000, making her cost $1,312,943. And no board could be found that thought it would be good policy to go on spending more money on that old wooden ship.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Has the Senator the record in his hand showing when the last expenditure was made and how much it was?

Mr. HALE. I have not the details here.

Mr. MCPHERSON. He would find if he had the record that in 1878 she became what was practically a new ship. She was built of live-oak. Everybody knows that a live-oak ship never rots and hardly ever wears out. I suppose that the Ticonderoga, according to the report of the present chief constructor of the Navy, is as good a ship almost as there is in the entire Navy.

Mr. HALE. Something must be left to the discretion of the boards and their judgment, and the intimation that this is a proceeding of the Secretary's, that it comes from him, and that he is seeking to annihilate the old wooden ships is in no degree borne out. The 20 per cent. limit was not his. The bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress made the limitation 25 per cent., and on full discussion (I think on the motion of the Senator himself to make it 30 per cent.) the Senate itself, cutting under the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, decided that we should not spend any more money on these old wooden ships above 20 per cent. It was a deliberate act taken by the Senate, and accorded with by the House afterward, that fixed the limitation. It was the act of Congress that told the Secretary what to do; it was the act of Congress that told him how to do it; and he would have been deserving of impeachment if he had not carried it out after, on such consideration as Congress gave to this subject, it fixed a policy clearly as it did. It did not originate with him, but was the solemn act of the two Houses of Congress, made the written law of the land by the President's signature, and all that the Secretary has done has been to carry that out.

I wish the Secretary to read the ample provisions that were put in the law which the Secretary of the Navy has been pursuing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the section of the law referred to.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 5. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be appraised, in such manner as may seem best, all vessels of the Navy which have been stricken from the Navy Register under the provisions of the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, approved August 5, 1882. And if the said Secretary shall deem it for the best interest of the United States to sell any such vessel or vessels, he shall, after such appraisal, advertise for sealed proposals for the purchase of the same, for a period not less than three months, in such newspapers as other naval advertisements are published, setting forth the name and location and the appraised value of such vessel, and that the same will be sold, for cash, to the person or persons or corporation or corporations offering the highest price therefor above the appraised value thereof; and such proposals shall be opened on a day and hour and at a place named in said advertisement, and record thereof shall be made. The Secretary of the Navy shall require to accompany each bid or proposal a deposit in cash of not less than 10 per cent. of the amount of the offer or proposal, and also a bond, with two or more sureties to be approved by him, conditioned for the payment of the remaining 90 per cent. of the amount of such offer or proposal within the time fixed in the advertisement. And in case default is made in the payment of the remaining 90 per cent., or any part thereof, the Secretary, within the prescribed time thereof, shall advertise and resell said vessel under the provisions of this act.

And in that event said cash deposit of 10 per cent. shall be considered as forfeited to the Government, and shall be applied, first, to the payment of all costs and expenditures attending the advertisement and resale of said vessel; second, to the payment of the difference, if any, between the first and last sale of said vessel; and the balance, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent a suit upon said bond for breach of any of its conditions. Any vessel sold under the foregoing provisions shall be delivered to the purchaser upon the full payment to the Secretary of the Navy of the amount of such proposal or offer; and the net proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the Treasury. But no vessel of the Navy shall hereafter be sold in any other manner than herein provided, or for less than such appraised value, unless the President of the United States shall otherwise direct in writing. In case any vessel now in process of construction in any navy-yard has been or shall be found to be unworthy of being completed, and has been and shall be condemned under the provisions of said act, and can not properly be sold, and it becomes necessary to remove the same, the cost of such removal shall be paid out of the net proceeds derived from the sale of other vessels hereby authorized to be sold.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope that my friend from New Jersey is satisfied upon that point at least. Recurring to his remark as to the purpose of the Navy Department to wipe out, as he expresses it, the old wooden ships of the United States Navy, and protesting against it, I desire to call his attention to a table which I find in the report of the honorable Senator from Maine, a statement showing the date of the construction, original cost, and total expense for all repairs since, of vessels borne on the Navy Register November, 1883, under the Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam-Engineering, and Equipment and Recruiting. It seems to me that the wooden ships of the American Navy are very rapidly wiping themselves out without any assistance from Congress or the Navy Department. I think it was a wise provision of law which required that no vessel should be repaired that would cost more than 20 per cent. of what it would cost to build a new one of the same size and class. These wooden vessels are entirely out of date; they are obsolete. I undertake to say that in case of any difficulty with a foreign power it would be absolutely murder to require the naval officers of this Government to go upon such ships to contend with the improved naval armaments of the world.

In reference to the vessels that we have authorized to be constructed, the Chicago, the Atlanta, and Boston, and the Dolphin, and those that are provided for in the bill, the Senator from New Jersey I understand is willing to build the gunboats, but is unwilling to go on with the cruisers. I will, at the risk of being a little tiresome, read an extract from the report of the advisory board as to the character of the vessels now under construction and those that are proposed to be built, found in Appendix II of the report submitted by the Senator from Maine:

There are now in course of construction three of the distinct types and sizes of steel unarmored cruisers of which the fleet will be entirely composed. Of these the Chicago is a representative of the fully equipped cruising fighting vessel, with qualities of speed, endurance, battery power, and handiness carried to the maximum of development permissible without gaining in one at the expense of the other. Her size is at the limit which is considered the test for the full attainment of these qualities, due consideration being given to the question of economy in construction and maintenance. The vessels of this type will replace those of the Wabash, Tennessee, and Trenton types in the old fleet, gaining greatly in power, efficiency, and compactness by the improvements and consolidation. The experience gained in the completion of the design of the Chicago and the necessity for the early acquirement of more vessels of this description have led the board to recommend the immediate construction of one ship of this class and type.

Then the board go on to describe the character of the Boston and Atlanta, and recommend the building of two more of that type. Then they discuss the Dolphin. I understood the Senator from New Jersey to state that the Dolphin was intended really as a dispatch-boat, to use his own expression, to wait upon the Admiral or the commander of the fleet. I do not so understand it. The board say:

The Dolphin has no counterpart in the constitution of the old fleet, in consequence of which much misunderstanding exists with regard to her value. Her type is considered a very necessary auxiliary to the naval fighting force for duties requiring lightness and speed, which could not be performed economically by vessels composing the main body of the fleet. Of even greater importance, however, is the fact that this vessel serves as a basis from which to develop the pure type of lightly-armed, high-speed, economically-maintained commerce-destroyers. As this ship will stand when completed she will be very effective in this respect, although her normal fleet-service is of a different nature. The especial features developed in this vessel and the requirements of the fleet brought about by the length and position of our coast lines lead the board to recommend that a second vessel of this type and size be commenced at once, the following being the estimates of the cost of construction and outfit:

Machinery	175,000
Ordnance	50,000
Equipment	25,000
Total	482,000

In the Dolphin actual working and fighting qualities are sacrificed in order to obtain fully the maximum speed and endurance consistent with her size. It is considered that for the proper and economical performance of the multifarious duties of general cruising, survey, exploration, &c., in time of peace, and convoy, blockade, and squadron-cruising in time of war, a different type of vessel of the same size as the Dolphin should be introduced. These vessels would replace those of the Juniata, Wachusett, and Essex types in the old fleet, gaining by the perfection of their design greatly increased efficiency for the general work required, while similarity of type throughout the class would render them cheaper in general maintenance and more compact and effective for combined work.

So the Dolphin is not simply a dispatch-boat to wait upon the Admiral or commanding officer of the fleet, as I understand the Senator from New Jersey to have said.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator from South Carolina will bear in mind that the Senator from New Jersey made no criticism. He read the criticism of a very capable naval officer.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no doubt in the world that the gentleman from whose testimony the Senator read is quite accomplished; but I prefer to take the opinion of the advisory board appointed by the Secretary of the Navy in preference to that of the gentleman whose testimony the Senator read. This report is made by the advisory board, and in all substantial particulars the advisory board is unanimous. As the Senator from Maine stated, there was some difference as to the amount of sail power, some difference as to whether the engines should be vertical or horizontal, some difference as to whether the furnaces should be lined with brick or with something else. In these minor particulars there was some difference of opinion; but the Secretary of the Navy took the responsibility, as he had the right to take it, and directed that the vessels should be made after the specifications and plans and in the manner recommended by the board. As I said, I prefer to take the opinion of this board of accomplished experts, presided over by Admiral Shufeldt, to the opinion of some individual who may be entirely competent, who may be entirely honest, who may be entirely sincere, but I do not think the Senate could venture to substitute his opinion for the opinion of the board.

One of the difficulties that I always contended with in coming to any conclusion as to what kind of a navy we wanted, what character of vessels we required, has been the difference appearing to prevail among the naval officers themselves. One admiral would have one opinion, one commodore another, one captain and one commander another. But this board is substantially unanimous, and for the first time since I have been a member of this body is the board unanimous as to the character and number of ships that we should have. Not only that, but the Committee on Naval Affairs had before it such officers as Admiral Porter, Rear-Admiral Rodgers, Rear-Admiral Jenkins, Commodore Semmes, Commander Barber, and other gentlemen whom I might mention, all of whom are gentlemen of the highest character, and I think without a dissenting voice all agreed as to the advisability and absolute necessity of building some such ships as those provided for in the bill—I mean the four cruisers which the Senator from New Jersey would not have built.

Mr. McPHERSON. Would it interfere with the Senator now for me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from South Carolina speaks of the board being unanimous. To what board does he refer?

Mr. BUTLER. I speak of the last advisory board.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator is also aware that another advisory board were equally unanimous with respect to their recommendations, and that the conclusions of the two boards are not at all alike.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not so understand it. The recommendations of the first advisory board were not carried out, as I understand, because they did not have the money. We made an appropriation and directed the Secretary of the Navy to build ships in accordance with the recommendation of the next advisory board, and he is now doing it, and while, as the Senator has suggested, there can be nothing like absolute certainty, for it is to a certain extent experimental——

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator has been very kind; perhaps he will yield to me a moment further.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator says that to a certain extent it was experimental. He knows when the contracts were given; he knows when the completed ship was to be delivered under the contract that we appropriated for, which will be next December. There is plenty of time to test the practical result.

During the next session of Congress we can make an appropriation for more ships if the ships that will have been constructed prove worthy of it. Why not make it a certainty instead of longer dealing with experiments, that are called experiments both by the first advisory board and by distinguished officers?

Mr. BUTLER. I think they are not experiments to that extent. I have heard the opinion of no expert, no naval officer, who has not quite concurred in the policy of building these ships. I do not think that in that view it is experimental, but in some of the details of the construction of the vessels there are some experiments being made; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. ALLISON. There always are.

Mr. BUTLER. There always are. There never can be any improvement in naval architecture without experiment. England and France, Italy and Spain are every day spending vast sums of money in making experiments.

I find in the report made by the Senator from Maine accompanying this bill that there are to-day but thirty-one serviceable vessels in the United States Navy and three hundred and eighty-six guns. I will not pronounce judgment upon the character of those guns, but I do undertake to say that in case of a collision between either of the vessels of the American Navy and a vessel of any other power in the civilized world our guns would compare with theirs almost as a pop-gun with a long-range rifle. There are thirty-one serviceable vessels to-day in the United States Navy out of ninety-two, all told. What do we find in some of the other navies of the world? The following table has been furnished me by a gentleman for whose accuracy I am prepared to vouch:

	Armored ships.	Unarmored ships.	Transports.	Torpedo-boats.	Guns mounted.	Officers.	Men.	Marines.	Total personnel.
England	61	186	12	100	1,861	4,798	58,800	12,000	75,998
France	58	159	42	70	1,541	5,824	42,126	25,370	73,320
Germany	27	36	2	19	471	1,012	7,400	.....	8,412
Spain	5	81	4	3	424	2,367	14,000	7,033	23,400
Italy	18	23	11	17	311	1,014	15,055	3,638	19,707
Argentine Republic	4	28	.....	9	24	160	800	2,000	2,960
Chili	3	10	3	10	63	250	1,500	.....	1,750
Brazil	21	15	5	5	100	776	4,000	.....	4,776

I venture to say that the most insignificant, the least valuable ship of the Italian navy is better than the best one in the American Navy. I do not really think that I am venturing too far in making that statement.

I also submit a table showing the condition of our own Navy as to the number of ships, guns, &c.:

a Six iron paddle-wheel gunboats; four first-class steel torpedo-boats; eighteen second-class steel torpedo-boats. b Approximate.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to another important fact, in reply to what has fallen from the Senator from New Jersey, when he says that we must stop building ships, except gunboats; that we must wait until we have ascertained that the cruisers which are already authorized will come up with absolute exactitude and certainty to all that he thinks they ought to be, and that we should stop building that class of cruisers until we can ascertain that fact.

Mr. GARLAND. Would it suit the Senator to continue his remarks to-morrow?

Mr. BUTLER. I shall be through, I think, in five minutes or less.

The following cities of the United States can be bombarded by the most recent guns from positions which could be taken up by an enemy's vessels in spite of channel obstructions or our present defenses: Eastport, Portland, Portsmouth, Boston, New Bedford, Newport, New Haven, New London, New York, Brooklyn, Norfolk, Beaufort, Wilmington, Charleston, Fernandina, Key West, Pensacola, and Galveston. The English will have in a few months a clear fourteen-foot channel lying within their own boundaries from the ocean to the great lakes, which will admit vessels of very respectable size and force to these waters, where we have but one small, old-type, unarmored steamer. This exposes our large cities on the lakes to the dangers of a bombardment. In three weeks without previous preparation England can throw a fleet of thirteen armor-clads on our coast, and in four weeks ten more. Added to this would of course be a large number, probably forty unarmored vessels, and all of the steamers now engaged in the transatlantic trade. Armaments are provided for a large number of these at Halifax and Bermuda, so that they would not have to return to their home ports. These auxiliary cruisers would be more efficient for modern war purposes than two-thirds of our present naval vessels. During the late Egyptian campaign England withdrew seventy vessels from her carrying trade for war purposes without disturbing a single itinerary. In case of war with us the whole number of steamers of the transatlantic trade would be available in addition.

Germany, which twenty years ago had no navy to speak of, can to-day mobilize her whole force in eight days, and in three weeks could have a fleet of six powerful armor-clads off the port of New York. This force would be augmented by a goodly number of modern cruisers and the fine steamers of their transatlantic and West Indian trade. France can oppose a force of government vessels equal to that of England to our defenseless coast; she would be inferior in auxiliary force.

Italy, with her immense armor-clads, carrying the heaviest guns afloat, her swift cruisers and very respectable auxiliary force, would be very formidable.

All the navies of Europe and many of those of South America and Asia are provided with first-class torpedo-boats, which can and have made transatlantic passages without assistance.

If the statement I have just submitted is not enough to convince Congress of the absolute necessity of doing something which will give this Government a respectable navy, there is no argument that I can offer nor that any Senator on this floor can offer which will induce Congress to appropriate money to continue to build the class of cruisers provided for in the bill, and continue to make appropriations until we get a navy that shall be at least respectable. In the course of the examination which was made of the distinguished gentlemen who came before the committee, I asked Admiral Shufeldt the question whether it was a part of the plan of the advisory board to continue upon the line indicated by the present advisory board and the previous one—to build vessels until we had a respectable navy. His reply to me was that he thought by all means we ought to continue to build these fast steel cruisers until they reached eighty or ninety thousand tons. Rear-Admiral Rodgers concurred in this view, and Admiral Porter, while concurring in this view, went on to state further and perhaps laid more stress upon the importance of building gunboats than others who came before the committee. But it is well known that while gunboats are very important auxiliaries to all naval establishments, they are used principally for the coast defenses, to accompany fleets, and to navigate the inland lakes and streams near the seacoast. I therefore submit to the Senator from New Jersey that while his gunboats are very important, they do not accomplish the great need of the American Navy to-day.

Our old wooden vessels are rapidly going to decay. They have already cost the Government, it seems to me, three times as much as they ought to have cost; three times as much as the Senator would pay in any private establishment of his own; and why not retire them from the service—they are retiring themselves—and replace them with improved naval vessels built after the latest models, with all the light that the intelligent, able officers of the United States Navy can bestow upon business of this kind? We must suppose, we are bound to assume, that these distinguished gentlemen who feel a great pride in the American Navy, who are far more interested in having it built than any Senator on this floor, are doing everything that it is possible for human foresight to do in order to give us proper ships in the Navy. I, therefore, hope that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will not be concurred in, and that the bill as reported from the committee, and unanimously, with the exception of that Senator, will be passed by the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 26, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Monday.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I ask unanimous consent to print, in connection with the report from the Committee on Education submitted yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], a minority report.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand the gentleman from Ohio is not opposed to the substantive proposition involved in the bill, and I suggest therefore that he present his objections to the details of the bill by amendments when it is before the House for consideration.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I am opposed to the bill in its present form, while in favor of the general principle embraced in the bill. I shall ask leave to submit a minority report.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from Ohio will be accorded that privilege.

There was no objection.

ASSISTANT JOURNAL CLERK, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present at this time for present consideration a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

Joint resolution (H. Res. 186).

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Frank Galt the sum of $492 for services rendered as assistant journal clerk of the House of Representatives from December 3, 1883, to February 23, 1884, inclusive, being at the rate of $6 per diem.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve the right to object until I hear an explanation.

Mr. BLAND. This assistant journal clerk has been authorized by resolution of the House since the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress to be paid either out of the contingent fund or by a provision embodied in the sundry civil appropriation bill. The joint resolution now proposed is for the purpose of paying for the services which have been rendered from the beginning of the present session of Congress up to this time. The services are absolutely necessary——

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. It is absolutely impossible for us to understand what is going on, owing to the confusion.

The SPEAKER. Complaint is made that gentlemen are unable to hear what is being said because of the confusion in the Hall. Gentlemen are requested to be seated and suspend conversation.

Mr. BLAND. I repeat that since the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress this assistant journal clerk has been employed by resolution. The service is essential, and certainly Congress ought not to be willing to accept the services of any person without paying for it. The employment of an assistant has been recommended, as I understand, by the committee authorized to inquire into the number of the officers of the House. I can see no reason, therefore, why a man performing this necessary duty should not be paid.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BREWER, of New York. I object.

Mr. BLAND. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. I could not hear distinctly what the gentleman stated, but as I understand now the joint resolution is for the benefit of the assistant journal clerk I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. STEELE. I object.

STATUE OF REAR-ADMIRAL DU PONT.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 1490, and ask that it be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection to its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $3,200, being the unexpended balance of the sum appropriated under an act entitled "An act making an appropriation for the base and pedestal of a monument to the late Rear-Admiral Samuel Francis Du Pont, United States Navy," approved February 25, 1882, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, together with the further sum of $16,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection and completion of a statue of the late Rear-Admiral Samuel Francis Du Pont, United States Navy, to be placed in Du Pont Circle, in the city of Washington; and all money hereby appropriated shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana that this bill be taken from the Speaker's table for present consideration?

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask unanimous consent to offer for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. STEELE. I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the joint resolution submitted by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

The SPEAKER. The House is now engaged on another matter.

DIVORCE LAWS.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, directed to examine the questions touching the divorce laws between the several States, in accordance with a petition heretofore referred to that committee, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to hear some explanation of that resolution, reserving the right to object.

Mr. DUNHAM. A petition comes to me, signed by every one of the judges now on the bench in the city of Chicago, asking that some commission may be appointed by Congress for the purpose of seeing if it is possible to revise the divorce laws of the different States, so that there may be a uniformity. The object of the resolution simply is to ask the Committee on the Judiciary to look into the question and to authorize them to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. DUNHAM. Let the resolution, then, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to a reference of the resolution?

Mr. DUNN. I object.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. MULDROW. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for reference the bill (S. 19) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in the several States and Territories.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

VENEZUELAN CLAIMS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution of inquiry for reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I offer it by request.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the good of the public service, the following information, namely:

What action has been taken by the Governments of the United States and of Venezuela, and by each and either of said Governments, under the joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress approved March 3, 1883, entitled "A joint resolution providing for a new mixed commission in accordance with the treaty of April 25, 1866, with the United States of Venezuela;" and especially that the President communicate to the House what claim is made by the said Government of Venezuela, or by its representatives, in regard to the effect of the said joint resolution upon the said treaty, and upon the force and validity of the awards heretofore made under said treaty of April 25, 1866, and whether said Government of Venezuela is in any way delaying or declining to make payments upon the said awards, or to further proceed in respect of the validity of such awards or of any or either of them; and also that he communicate to this House a statement of the amount of moneys paid in under the said awards and the date of the last payment, what amount has been distributed, and why further distributions have not been made; and that he transmit to the House copies of all correspondence between the two Governments in relation to said treaty and awards since the said 3d of March, A. D. 1883.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SERGT. A. B. VAN HEUSEN.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the consent of the House to consider the joint resolution H. Res. 124, reported from the Committee on Ways and Means unanimously. It is a resolution of four or five lines only.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of joint resolution No. 124, and to put the same on its passage. The title of the joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 124) authorizing the collector at the port of New York to deliver, free of duty, a silver cup won by Sergt. A. B. Van Heusen as a member of the American rifle team at Wimbledon, in July, 1883.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WELLER. I suggest the propriety of the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WELLER. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] to demand the regular order.

Mr. WELLER. I did not demand the regular order. I am trying to get the floor myself. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MAYO. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

It will be remembered that about a week ago I rose to a question of personal privilege, but suspended my remarks to await the appearance of Mr. GEORGE D. WISE, my colleague from Virginia. I waited for his return. He came to see me, and told me he had been improperly reported in several respects, and he wished to correct a wrong impression he had made upon this floor. Of course I agreed he should do so. The matter, however, has gone on, and he has not done so. In the mean time I have just been told by the Clerk that many members of this House had been to examine this certificate. I presume that, misled by the statement of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, they had supposed it was different from the certificate given to the other members from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, is that a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is waiting to hear what the gentleman's question of privilege is.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I would like to make one remark. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague for a moment?

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I am entirely willing the gentleman should have the right to make any statement he pleases, but with the distinct understanding that I shall have the right to reply to him.

Mr. BLAND. I object, unless it is strictly a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet heard enough of the statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MAYO] to determine whether it is a privileged matter, under the rules of the House or not. The gentleman will please state as briefly as he can what is the matter of privilege.

Mr. MAYO. My statement is that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE] has stated on the floor of this House that the governor of Virginia refused to sign my certificate, when that gentleman knew positively that the governor of Virginia does not sign any certificate for any member from Virginia. I wish the certificate to be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think there is any question of privilege involved in the gentleman's statement.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I object to any further controversy until the Speaker has determined the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of members individually in their Representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess. (Rule IX.)

Mr. MAYO. Let me say——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that under this rule the statement of the gentleman presents any question of privilege.

Mr. MAYO. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE] said that I am a fraud, and that the governor of Virginia had said so. Is not that a matter of personal privilege to myself? [Great laughter.] The statement is false, and I have the documents here to prove it if I can have an opportunity.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled on the question.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of the committees for reports.

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be authorized to have printed for its use such papers and documents as it may deem necessary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that has been considered by the Committee on Rules, and therefore I do not object.

Mr. RANDALL. It relates only to printing Senate joint resolutions which come to the Committee on Rules, and also to propositions suggesting amendments to the rules which are referred from members of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object.

Mr. RANDALL. They are generally brief, and having them printed we save time.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISEASES AMONG DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the special order, which is the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

The bill is being considered under the five-minute rule, and the pending amendments offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] and the amendment thereto offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] will be read by the Clerk.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. There were several pro forma amendment offered yesterday and withdrawn, and I have been unable to determine by reading the RECORD this morning just exactly what is the status of the question before the House at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. For that purpose the Chair has ordered the Clerk to read the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] and the amendment offered thereto by the gentleman himself.

Mr. WELLER. I wish to withdraw the amendment which I offered yesterday and to present at this time a substitute therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first report the pending amendment submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE'S amendment was read.

Mr. KEIFER. Allow the first amendment to be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, will be again reported by the Clerk.

Mr. BAYNE. And I ask in that connection that the Clerk read the section as it will stand if my amendment be adopted.

The amendment proposed by Mr. BAYNE was again read and also the section as proposed to be amended.

Mr. WELLER. I now ask that my substitute be read, having withdrawn the one that was pending when the committee rose on yesterday.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1 by adding after the word "investigate," in line 6, the words "and ascertain by reference to and compilation from the reports made by county, State, and national authority;" so that said section will read as follows if so amended:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his Department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief thereof, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, and whose duty it shall be to investigate and ascertain by reference to and compilation from the reports made by county, State, and national authority, and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among them, and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country; and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose. The salary of the chief of said bureau shall be $3,000 per annum; and the Commissioner shall appoint a clerk for said bureau, with a salary of $1,500 per annum."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER].

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 66.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. COSGROVE. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Insert after the word "agriculture," in line 13—

"With the consent of the governor of the State or States in which the persons so employed are to act."

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 94.

Mr. COSGROVE (in his seat). On that I demand tellers.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I make the point of order that tellers have not been called for, as the gentleman has not risen from his seat to make the demand.

Mr. COSGROVE (rising). I demand tellers.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, and Mr. COSGROVE were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 84.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

Insert after the word "purpose," in line 15, the following:

"With the consent of the Legislature of the State or States in which the persons so employed are to act."

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I make the point of order that that amendment is identical with the one we have just voted upon and rejected.

Mr. HOPKINS. By no means.

Mr. STORM. It is essentially different. The executive is not the same as the Legislature of the State.

Mr. GIBSON. The one that was rejected was a provision that these persons were to act with the consent of the governor; this is with the consent of the Legislature of the State.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is evident that the amendment is entirely different from the one just acted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the two amendments to the committee, so that they may be informed prior to the ruling of the Chair thereon.

The Chair understands the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri on the right had reference to the consent of the governor?

Mr. COSGROVE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And this has reference to the consent of the Legislature of the State?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The Clerk will report the pending amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOPKINS'S amendment was again read.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to that amendment, as I am opposed to any and all amendments that may be offered to this bill. Not but that the Legislature of the State is the proper body, if there was to be any body here representing the State, for the governor would have no power in my State, and I apprehend no power in any of the States of this Union, unless it was given to him by the sovereign authority of the State, the Legislature.

But I am opposed to the amendments to this bill, and for the reason that you can not amend the thing so as to make it decent. I am reminded in this connection of an anecdote. I do not often tell one, but the committee will excuse me now, for I think it is applicable to this case. A long time ago, sir, there was a very famous man in the world known as the great poet of his age, Alexander Pope. He was a deformed man; irritable—all men of genius are irritable, to wit, my friend from Missouri showed a great deal of irritation on yesterday. [Laughter.] Now, on a certain occasion Pope had attended a theater. It was before the days of gas, and they had about all public buildings link-boys, boys with lanterns to light the way. Pope had one bad habit, which was always, when irritated, to use this peculiar oath, "God mend me!" Well, the link-boys got about him with their cries, "Will you have a light; will you have a torch?" Pope responded after a while with irritation, "No, no, no! God mend me!" One of these boys looked up at him with the remark: "God mend you? He had better make three new men than to undertake to do that." [Laughter.]

So, Mr. Chairman, with this bill. I would rather undertake to make three new bills than to amend this one—this which is vicious and unconstitutional from its head to its heel. Sir, my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] on yesterday accepted this proposition, that it belonged to him as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture to prove the constitutionality of this measure; and yet he never said a word about it, not one word, but contented himself with what amounted to pretty nearly a personal attack upon divers and sundry gentlemen who differ with him as to this bill.

Sir, I was singled out, and my distinguished friend informed me that he would not sit at my feet to learn the principles of constitutional law. He would be an intractable scholar, sir. I do not desire to become his teacher. But he needs a teacher. Sir, a gentleman who says upon this floor that he goes to the Constitution of the United States in order to ascertain the rights of the States pretends to be a constitutional lawyer. I had supposed that we examined the Constitution of the United States in order to ascertain what were the powers of the Federal Government, not of the State governments, but that the Constitution in this instrument had delegated to the Federal Government certain powers and all other powers belonged to the States. Sir, that is democracy, that is republicanism, that is constitutional law, and I hope my friend will learn it from some source before he gets through with this bill.

The gentleman went further and said, making almost a personal attack upon me, that he would refuse to learn constitutional law from the author of the unconstitutional and cowardly tariff-commission bill. Sir, I was the author of the bill called the tariff-commission bill, years ago, which passed the Senate unanimously; that is to say, fifteen men voting for a bill precisely like the bill I offered, except it assumed the power of appointing and constituting the commission, which my bill gave to the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GIBSON was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. EATON.

Mr. EATON. I have a word to say about that much-abused bill. I introduced it into the other branch of the Federal Legislature for the purpose of taking the question out of the realm of politics, for the purpose of making this great economic question a question to be determined outside of all party issues. That was my object. Was it patriotic or unpatriotic? Not constitutional! No man that knows the hornbook of the Constitution will pretend to say that the bill was an unconstitutional bill. Was it an unpatriotic bill? Ought not every man on this floor, Republican and Democrat, desire to take this great economic question out of politics, so that it might not be the foot-ball of politics every four years? Sir, had the bill which I had the honor to originate, which passed the Senate in the manner I have said—had it passed this House also there would have been a commission of intelligent gentlemen who would have had a year and a half to have digested and brought full information here so that the House might have acted intelligently upon this great question. Thus much for that, sir.

And my friend said this—I regret that he said it; I regret that he dared to say it—that Connecticut and New York and New Jersey were barnacles on the Democratic party. Sir, New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut elected in 1876 Samuel J. Tilden President of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Sir, I desire to tell this gentleman, who had the bad taste to lug politics into this House, that New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, if he and his associates are wise, will elect the next President of the United States. [Renewed applause.] Barnacles! New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut barnacles! Sir, the barnacle is bigger than the ship. I confess I am astonished that my friend, if I may so call him, although he will not permit me to teach him constitutional law, should have made a remark of that character before the House and before the country.

Mr. Chairman, I have said this bill was imperfect. So imperfect is it in the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that he said in his place on yesterday that he would adopt any amendment gentlemen might offer in order to make the bill satisfactory and constitutional. It ought to go out of this House either back to the committee for the purpose of a reformation of the bill, or it ought to be stamped upon by every intelligent, Constitution-loving man.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GOFF and Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], and will afterward recognize the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I desire only to make so much of a reply to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut as may be necessary to set myself right and to correct him. I was not aware that I had made any personal attack on the gentleman. On the contrary, I expressly stated that the remark I made in regard to the tariff-commission bill was simply an iteration of the statement I had made when that bill was under discussion in the House, and that I meant it in no disrespect to the gentleman from Connecticut. I am not aware that I was irritable yesterday or that I am irritable to-day. I think I was in a very amiable mood. But the gentleman certainly misapprehended my remarks if he understood me to say that New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut were barnacles on the Democratic party.

Mr. EATON. We all so understood you to say.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I spoke of individuals, not of States; nor did I name a single State.

Mr. EATON. The RECORD will show. I looked for the gentleman's speech in the RECORD, but he kept it for revision. He was wise.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. But the reporter has his notes, and I will call upon the reporter for his notes, and will have them read to the House before this discussion is over.

Mr. EATON. Let me suggest to my friend's recollection, for I would not willingly do him wrong and he knows it, that he not only mentioned the States I have named, but also Ohio and Indiana in the same connection.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I said what the Democratic party needed more than anything else at this time were funerals; funerals in Massachusetts, funerals in New York, funerals in Indiana, and funerals in Ohio.

Mr. EATON. You mean Republican funerals, I suppose.

Mr. BROADHEAD. What does the gentleman from Missouri mean by a funeral? Does he mean to say, in the language of Mr. Conkling, that the Democratic party must shoot down their leaders in the presence of the enemy?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Not by any means. I did not intend, Mr. Chairman, to be led into any further political discussion in regard to this bill. It is not necessary that in this House or anywhere else I should define my position as a Democratic member of the House or as a Democrat. So far as the principles involved in this bill are concerned I have said from the beginning that the committee and myself in charge of this bill would be willing to accept any amendment offered by any gentleman on the floor that would strengthen the bill or carry out the purpose for which it is framed.

If the bill can be made better by this Committee of the Whole I desire to see it made better. The gentleman from Connecticut says that he would rather undertake to draft three new bills than to amend this one. I would be exceedingly obliged to him, and I think the agricultural interests of this country would be obliged to him, if he would draft a bill, present it to this House, have it referred to the committee, and then have it come back here to be voted upon.

I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] will not be adopted.

Mr. GOFF. I move to strike out the last word. I do not desire at this time to give the reasons why I shall support this bill. I desire to allude to several points which have been made by gentlemen in the discussion of this bill, who have taken that opportunity to allude to the formation of the State of West Virginia and to the question of the assumption by West Virginia of that portion of the debt of Virginia which they claim should be paid by West Virginia.

I am not going to detain the House at this time with a discussion of that matter, as it is historical in its character and statistical in its nature, and would not be understood if I were to detail it. I will therefore ask permission to print as a portion of my remarks the statement which I have prepared on that subject.

Mr. STORM. Is there anything personal in it?

Mr. GOFF. Not at all.

Mr. GIBSON. I can speak for my colleague [Mr. GOFF], and assure the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] that there is nothing personal in the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks permission to print as a portion of his remarks some statements prepared by him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following are the remarks referred to:

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, before giving my reasons for supporting this bill I desire to allude for a few moments to the remarks of my eloquent friend from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE], delivered on Saturday last, when this subject was under consideration. In his facetious remarks relative to my colleague [Mr. GIBSON] he was pleased to make allusions to my State and to her action in connection with the Virginia debt that I do not think it proper to permit to pass unnoticed. He deemed it proper to speak of West Virginia in language not altogether new, as the "bastard State of a political rape." Mr. Chairman, West Virginia is the legal fruit of constitutional wedlock. The bans were announced by our old mother, Virginia, she giving her assent in the manner provided by our fathers. The great loyal heart of a struggling nation throbbed with delight when the nuptials were celebrated, and the Congress of the United States was present at the birth of this State, and by its legislative decree gave due notice of West Virginia's legitimacy.

The question of the settlement of the debt of the State of Virginia and the part West Virginia should assume can not be satisfactorily discussed now, and should not, I submit, have been alluded to at this time. It is a question the people of my State take great interest in, are jealous of. It affects their credit; it touches their honor. The State of West Virginia has ever been willing, been desirous, of making the settlement the gentleman alludes to. She to-day desires that adjustment. The mode of settlement was provided for when the State was formed. That method is part of her organic law; it received the approval of the Congress of the United States. The ordinance of the Virginia convention, held at Wheeling in 1861, provides the mode of stating the account between Virginia and West Virginia, as follows:

> The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the debt of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of said debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the Treasury from the counties included within the new State during the same period.

The constitution of West Virginia contains the following article:

> An equitable proportion of the debt of Virginia prior to January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State; and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years.

The Legislature of Virginia on the 23d day of February, 1866, passed a joint resolution authorizing three commissioners to be appointed, with instructions to treat with West Virginia—first, "for the restoration of Virginia to its ancient jurisdiction and boundaries; "and second, relative to the proper adjustment of the debt.

In reply to this the West Virginia Legislature, on the 28th day of February, 1867, passed a resolution refusing to treat for the reunion of West Virginia with Virginia, but authorizing the appointment of commissioners to adjust the debt as soon as the suit of The State of Virginia vs. The State of West Virginia, then pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, should be determined. The object of that suit was to recover jurisdiction by Virginia over the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, then held by West Virginia. It can be readily seen that no settlement of the debt question could have been made until it was decided which State was entitled to hold said territory. That suit was decided in favor of West Virginia. The Congress of the United States on the 2d day of March, 1867, remitted the State of Virginia to the control of the United States. Virginia reorganized and adopted a constitution suited to the changed order of affairs in 1869, and was recognized as a State in the Union and restored to representation in Congress on the 25th day of January, 1870.

On the 18th day of February, 1870, the Legislature of Virginia authorized the appointment of commissioners to treat with West Virginia relative to the debt. The governor of Virginia appointed said commissioners, who visited the Legislature of West Virginia, then in session, which body appointed a joint committee to confer with the Virginia commissioners. As the result of said conference the West Virginia Legislature passed a joint resolution, on the last day of its session in the year 1870, authorizing the appointment of commissioners by the governor of that State to adjust all matters relating to the debt with Virginia. This resolution was enlarged by the West Virginia Legislature on the 15th day of February, 1871, and the commissioners were appointed, as I will show hereafter.

While these proceedings were transpiring in West Virginia, the General Assembly of Virginia, on the 11th of February, 1871, adopted a resolution requesting the State of West Virginia to arbitrate all matters pertaining to said debt, thus rescinding the resolution of the Virginia Legislature of February 18, 1870, authorizing her commissioners to act. As the mode of arbitration proposed by Virginia did not include the manner of adjustment and the basis of settlement, as provided for in the ordinance of the Virginia convention of August 20, 1861, which I have alluded to as the "Wheeling convention," there was nothing left for West Virginia to do but insist on her rights under said ordinance and under her constitution, which I have quoted, decline said arbitration, and insist on the settlement through the commissioners who had already been appointed. This course was taken by West Virginia by act of her Legislature of February 24, 1871.

Under the provisions of said last-mentioned act the governor of West Virginia appointed General John J. Jackson, Hon. J. M. Bennett, and Hon. A. W. Campbell, three well-known, well-informed citizens, of high character, well acquainted with Virginia history and finances, one of whom—Mr. Bennett—had been auditor of accounts of the State of Virginia during the entire period of the late war; appointed them, and, as authorized by law to do, they proceeded in their efforts to treat with Virginia in reference to said debt. With what result is well known to those who have given the slightest attention to this subject. The country generally, though, has been misinformed. This matter should not be discussed with partisan feeling nor in Bombastes Furioso style. If not a question of "State rights," it is one of the rights of a State.

The commissioners appointed by the governor of West Virginia met at Parkersburg, W. Va., on the 9th day of August, 1871, to organize and arrange a mode of procedure. On that day they notified the governor of West Virginia of their organization, and they also transmitted the following letter to the governor of Virginia:

PARKERSBURG, W. VA., August 9, 1871.

SIR: The undersigned have the honor to inform you that, under the joint resolutions passed by the Legislature of West Virginia on the 15th and 24th days of February last, they have been appointed commissioners by the governor of West Virginia to treat with Virginia in regard to the debt as it stood on the 1st day of January, 1861.

Also, that they met in this city to-day for the purpose of entering upon the discharge of their duties, and to this end have designated General John J. Jackson as their chairman, through whom they propose to receive such communications as your excellency may be pleased to submit.

Will your excellency be pleased to indicate at your earliest convenience what action, if any, has been, or is likely to be, taken by Virginia in the matter of appointing commissioners, or, in the event of no such appointments, what channel of communication will be open to us?

We have the honor to be, your excellency's most obedient servants,

JOHN J. JACKSON.
J. M. BENNETT.
A. W. CAMPBELL.

To His Excellency the GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA.

The West Virginia commissioners then adjourned, to meet at Richmond, the capital of Virginia, at a day thereafter to be determined.

They met again, in the city of Richmond, on the 9th day of November, 1871. The governor of Virginia, then Hon. Gilbert C. Walker, refused to receive them as commissioners of the State of West Virginia, and claimed that under the law as it then existed he had no right to appoint commissioners to act with them. Thus, receiving no encouragement from the governor, and desiring, if possible, to procure certain information, explicit and official, bearing directly on the settlement of said debt, said West Virginia commissioners, on the 14th day of November, 1871, addressed the following communication:

RICHMOND, November 14, 1871.

SIR: I am directed by the commissioners representing West Virginia in the matter of the public debt of Virginia prior to the 1st of January, 1861, to procure from your office such information as can be furnished upon the following points, namely:

1. The actual amount of the public debt of Virginia on the 1st of January, 1861. And under this head the amounts of said debt owned by the sinking fund, the amount owned by the literary fund, and the amount by the library fund.

2. What portion of the bonded debt was invested, and how invested, on the 1st of January, 1861. Also, what portion of the investment was productive, what were the dividends or profits arising therefrom for the year 1860, and whether any such investments have since been donated, changed, converted, or otherwise disposed of.

3. What portion of the appropriations expended in West Virginia for public improvements came from the sales of State bonds and what portion from the revenues or taxes of Virginia.

4. A copy of the advertisement for the redemption of a portion of the public debt on the 1st of January, 1861.

5. A statement of the amount of public debt actually redeemed on the 1st of January, 1861, pursuant to said advertisement.

Upon these points the commissioners desire to hear from you at your earliest convenience.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. W. CAMPBELL, Secretary.

To the SECOND AUDITOR OF VIRGINIA.

The following reply was received to said request:

SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE, Richmond, November 16, 1871.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 14th was received. You ask me for a report upon a variety of questions connected with our public debt; the transactions of the board of public works in regard to it, and the financial affairs of the State, which it is understood, of course, you propose to use in the contemplated adjustment of the portion to be paid by West Virginia of the debt.

To answer the questions propounded would involve an amount of labor which we could not bestow on the subject. But, apart from this, I presume at an early day this office will be called upon by the executive or the General Assembly of Virginia for detailed reports of all the matters referred to, which will be available to you.

The books and records of this office are open to your inspection.

I trust that in failing to respond to your inquiries you will not regard me as in any wise wanting in official courtesy to you or your associates. None certainly is intended.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, yours,

ASA ROGERS.

A. W. CAMPBELL, Esq., Secretary, &c.

After this the West Virginia commissioners closed their labors in Richmond and returned to their homes.

It is thus seen that Virginia, after proposing an adjustment by means of commissioners, declined to carry it into effect when the West Virginia commissioners were knocking at the door of the executive office in the capital of Virginia.

Why this treatment? What change had come over the spirit of Virginia's dream? Can we not discover it, and without trouble? In February, 1871, the West Virginia resolution was passed and communicated to the governor of Virginia. The questions relating to what has since become known as the "funding bill" were then under discussion in Virginia. The manner of adjustment proposed in that bill was considered much more advantageous to the citizens of Virginia than any adjustment they could possibly make with West Virginia.

The people of Virginia, her Legislature, her governor well knew that when the hour of settlement came, when the account was balanced, as provided for in the ordinance and constitution, the preposterous claim theretofore set up, that West Virginia was liable to about $15,000,000 of the Virginia debt, would be exploded, and that it would be shown that West Virginia's portion of the ante bellum debt was under $1,000,000, if anything at all.

So the resolution authorizing commissioners was repealed by Virginia; so our commissioners met with no generous reception, and on the 30th of March, 1871, the "funding bill" passed the Virginia Legislature, by which there is arbitrarily apportioned to West Virginia one-third of the debt, not as it stood on the 1st day of January, 1861, the date fixed by the constitution, but as it would stand on the 1st day of July, 1871, after the interest had been twice compounded; and it was also apportioned upon the basis, as claimed, of territory and population, without the slightest regard for the equities of the case so notorious for years, and incorporated into the ordinance providing for the formation of West Virginia.

Under this funding act the State of Virginia has issued to the creditors of that State—those holding her bonds issued prior to January 1, 1861—two obligations of Virginia, one a bond for two-thirds of the debt, the other a certificate of indebtedness for the other third, to be paid whenever a settlement is had with West Virginia.

Remember, West Virginia is no party to this contract; does not participate in this settlement; the adjustment she desired is refused by Virginia, that State preferring this contract with her creditors.

These certificates read as follows:

This is to certify that there is due unto ——, heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, —— dollars, being one-third of bond surrendered under the provisions of an act approved March 30, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for the funding and payment of the public debt" (namely, bond No. —, with interest amounting to —— dollars). Payment of said one-third, and interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall hereafter be had between the States of Virginia and West Virginia in regard to the public debt of the State of Virginia existing at the time of its dismemberment, and the State of Virginia holds said bonds so far as unfunded in trust for the holder thereof, or his assigns.

In testimony whereof, this certificate has been signed by the treasurer and countersigned by the second auditor, as prescribed by law.

Treasurer Commonwealth of Virginia.

——, ——,
Second Auditor.

This is erroneously called a "West Virginia certificate." That State has no debt certificates; she has issued no bonds; her constitution forbids the creation of any liability in the nature of a public debt.

Now, it is plain to us all that as soon as a settlement takes place between Virginia and West Virginia, Virginia, according to the terms of the certificates I have just read, becomes liable to the holders thereof for their payment, and that whether she obtains anything by said adjustment from West Virginia or not. Hence, I say it is not to the interest of Virginia to make this settlement. She has made a most advantageous contract with her creditors, and in her present embarrassed financial status she is not going to cancel the terms of that contract.

Now, it is not my intention to discuss at this time the mode by which West Virginia shows she is not indebted to Virginia in anything like the sum set apart by that State as due from West Virginia, if indebted at all. It is not necessary I should. I am prepared to do so, and will hereafter should it be deemed best. I will at present only state that taking the provision of the ordinance of the Virginia convention of 1861 as the basis of settlement, as we must do, and charging to West Virginia all expenditures made by the State of Virginia within the limits of the present State of West Virginia and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State of Virginia during the time said debt was accruing, and deducting from the aggregate so found the moneys paid into the Virginia treasury from the territory now constituting West Virginia—and this is the basis of settlement Virginia consented to in 1861 and that the Supreme Court of the United States say is to be followed, and the result is that Virginia is indebted to West Virginia to-day.

And, Mr. Chairman, it is not strange that this result is reached. It may surprise some who are not familiar with Virginia history, but those conversant with the injustice measured out to "Trans-Alleghany Virginias," to that stretch of country situated between the mountains and the Ohio now called West Virginia, know that I speak "but the words of truth and soberness." For many, many years before the war of the rebellion Western Virginia was but a mere tributary, a conquered province as it were, to that magnificent land east of the mountains, "the Piedmont country, rolling to the sea." The present generation read it from the pages of Virginia's harsh legislation, hear it from the lips of our old men, and know that our fathers were but "hewers of wood and drawers of water" to the favored class who lived along the Shenandoah, the James, the Potomac, and in the magnificent belt those rivers lined.

They were taxed, but they received no benefit from taxes paid. Their hard earnings were taken from them and expended in colleges, universities, railroads, canals, turnpikes, plank-roads, and fashionable improvements among their more-favored brothers, who dwelt in a land, I must say, as fair as any God has ever given the sons of men for a habitation. They were taxed, but they were not fairly represented. For long years the burdens laid upon them were greater than they could bear. Natural barriers prevented commercial intercourse. There was but little community of interest, and, as the events of 1861 disclosed, but little community of sentiment.

The desire for the formation of a new State antedates the war for over a quarter of a century. It is a mistake to say it was produced by the war. The war of the rebellion only gave opportunity to those "who long had sought, and mourned because they found it not," the way to carry into successful fruition the hopes they had long cherished, that had become dear to them even as their lives, and of planting on their mountain peaks the banner that floats there to-day, with their motto inscribed thereon, "Montani semper liberi." They are a people who in the darkest hour of your civil strife, when the life of your nation was trembling in the balance, offered the aid of their strong right arms, and in this

Hall of Congress united their destinies with those of the Union, and who for long years prayed for the freedom, the true liberty, this great nation has given them.

I now yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] the remainder of my time.

Mr. REED. I do not desire rudely to interfere in the interesting colloquy which has been going on on the Democratic side of this Chamber. I have listened with pleasure to both gentlemen, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], and so far as they reflect upon each other I agree with both of them. [Laughter.] It always does take at least two Democrats to tell the whole truth about the Democratic party, and they do not always succeed at that. [Renewed laughter.]

I have been very much interested in the constitutional law which has been presented here. I note two different kinds of constitutional lawyers—the one, the constitutional lawyer pure and simple, represented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD], and the other, the political constitutional lawyer, represented by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON]. The one always tries to give some reasons for the faith that is in him; the other does not think it necessary. [Laughter.]

Here is a bill of the utmost importance to the people of this country. We are a great producing nation. If we can cause our cattle, our hog products, and in general the products of our farms to be exported we are certainly doing a great service to the farmers of the country. There is one obstacle in the way of that; that is, that foreign nations have the idea that some animal diseases exist among our cattle. Our desire is to prove to the world that such is not the fact, or that if such is liable to be the fact we are taking proper measures to put down those diseases.

Foreign nations know absolutely nothing about our States; they do know something about the National Government; and that is precisely what the Constitution of the United States intended should be the case. That Constitution provided that all our relations with foreign governments should be through the General Government of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALKINS. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. I thank the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS]. We have a disease which exists among us which we desire to remove, but which no State Legislature has thus far been able to reach. We have also the necessity of proving to the world by the only evidence which they can understand that we are taking measures for the preservation of health and to prevent the exportation of diseased products.

In view of this tremendous necessity which exists there ought to be some strong reasons given why this measure should be regarded as unconstitutional. Does the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] condescend to give us any reason? No. He gets up and in a tone of horror equaled only by the solemnity of his manner tells us that this bill is unconstitutional, dreadfully so. How? The Constitution has one provision which is just as clear as it is broad. I will read it.

Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

How broad that is, how broad that was intended to be, there is no specification. It was intended to cover matters broader even than those who made it could think of. They left it within the discretion of Congress, simply because it was a power which if given at all ought to be given so broad as to meet all the varying exigencies not only of the present but of all future time.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD], being obliged by his training to give some reasons for his position on this subject, cites certain decisions of the court which refer to the police power of the States, and which, if the Congress does not take it up, the States may exercise. Now, if he will examine the subject further he will perceive that not one of those cases alluded to by him militates against the provisions of this bill.

What is the interpretation of that clause given by the courts? I will read from the case of Sherlock against Allen, 93 United States Reports, page 103:

It is true that the commercial power conferred by the Constitution is one without limitation.

Precisely what I have said.

It authorizes legislation with respect to all the subjects of foreign and interstate commerce, the persons engaged in it, and the instruments by which it is carried on.

How could any language conferring power be stronger than that is? Yet the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] has twice got up here and proclaimed that this thing was utterly unconstitutional; so infamously unconstitutional that he would not even condescend to tell us why, but referred us to what he called the hornbook of constitutional law.

The only test recognized by a strict constructionist as to the constitutionality of a measure, so far as I have noticed in this House, is the one expounded some years ago by the Hon. Martin I. Townsend, of New York. If a strict constructionist wants a bill passed it is constitutional; if he does not want it passed it is unconstitutional.

Now, I protest against this hackneyed degradation of the Constitution by making a mop-broom of it to sweep up everything that gentlemen think they do not believe in, for they sometimes sweep up jewels as well as dirt.

We have, then, the constitutional power; how is it proposed to be applied? First, it is proposed that by the consent of the States we shall go in and trample out the disease where we find it. Now there can be nothing unconstitutional in that, because violence can not be done to the willing; if a State consents, the State is not interfered with. If a State does not consent, we simply provide by section 4 of the bill that the State or district shall be declared to be in quarantine. How and for what purpose? Simply to apply to it a rule with regard to commerce—that cattle shall not be transported out of the State. With the amendments which I shall propose to this section it will amount simply to the exercise of the right of Congress to regulate commerce; and this the Constitution of the United States says we have; and such an exercise of it as we propose has been sustained by the Supreme Court.

Mr. BROADHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to have heard the remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED]. I am always interested in what he says. He is a good lawyer, and a good constitutional lawyer. The gentleman seems to recognize the difference between the power to regulate commerce and the power to establish police regulations. That difference has been recognized in all the decisions made by the Supreme Court of the United States upon this question. The gentleman will recollect the case of New York vs. Milne, referred to by Judge Miller in the Slaughter-house cases, in which it was held that a law passed by the State of New York providing for the inspection of vessels, the registration of passengers, and an inquiry into their age, health, and condition, although the enactment did have a connection with the subject of foreign commerce, was nevertheless a police regulation of the State of New York, and was valid, in spite of the provision of the Constitution of the United States declaring that Congress should have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States."

Mr. REED. Was it not suggested in that same case that if Congress had undertaken to legislate on that subject the Congressional legislation would alone have been been dominant?

Mr. BROADHEAD. I think not. I think Judge Miller intimates the contrary when he says that now that question has been raised; but he does not raise it, nor does his language justify such an inference as the gentleman suggests. He says:

Up to the present period in the constitutional history of the country this power has always been conceded to belong to the States, however it may now be questioned in some of its details.

And quotes with approval the language of Chief-Justice Marshall in Gibbons vs. Ogden, in which he says no direct power over these objects is granted to Congress, and consequently they remain subject to State legislation.

The power to regulate commerce, Mr. Chairman, does not imply the power to destroy commerce. The power to regulate commerce can not embrace the power to prohibit the transportation of products from one State to another, for that is the destruction of commerce. I repeat, the power to regulate does not imply the power to destroy.

Mr. REED. But it includes the power to prevent diseased matter from being transported, which is a different thing from stopping commerce.

Mr. BROADHEAD. As that is unquestionably a police regulation, as I understand the decisions, it belongs exclusively to the States. It was so held in the case of The Railroad Company vs. Husen, from the State of Missouri. The only ground on which the Supreme Court held that act of the Missouri Legislature to be unconstitutional was because it absolutely prohibited the transportation of cattle, without reference to their condition. Judge Strong, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

It is noticeable that the statute interposes a direct prohibition against the introduction into the State of all Texas, Mexican, or Indian cattle during eight months of each year, without any distinction between such as may be diseased and such as are not.

If that law, passed by the Legislature of Missouri, had based the prohibition upon the fact of the cattle being diseased, it would of course have been valid under this decision. Under this very decision it is held, as I have shown, that the States have power to pass laws for the establishment of police regulations in order to preserve the comfort, the health, the property, or the lives of citizens of the State. As I have before said, this is a high prerogative of sovereignty, which does not belong to the Government of the United States except as regards territory over which it has exclusive jurisdiction, such as the arsenals, dock-yards, District of Columbia, and the Territories. Here let me ask the gentleman from Maine whether he holds that the power proposed to be given in this bill to an agent of the bureau of animal industry to go into the State of Missouri or the State of Maine, if you please, enter upon a man's farm, inspect his cattle, determine that some of them are diseased, and have them taken out and shot—is this an exercise of the power to regulate commerce?

It may be done under this bill whether the man intends to export them or not. If they are found to be diseased, that is all that is necessary. He may pronounce judgment upon them and have them taken out and slaughtered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. REED. That is, with the agreement of the State authorities.

Mr. BROADHEAD. No, sir; but the law expressly provides if the State authorities do not agree to it, then it may be taken in the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. REED. Not at all.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Not at all.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, representing as I do a portion of a great State that is interested largely in stock-raising, I desired, in the general debate of this bill, to occupy some portion of the time; but having failed to obtain recognition then, I shall ask by unanimous consent, if I am not able to conclude my remarks in the five minutes allowed me under the rules, I may be permitted to print them in the RECORD as though they were delivered.

I favor the erection of a statutory wall so high and so solid as not only to stay the spread of this disease so that it may never reach the great beef-growing country of the West, but, further, such enactment as will root out, destroy, and extirpate this disease in this whole country.

Objection has been urged against this bill on the ground that it gives too much authority to the Commissioner of Agriculture, but in my judgment this lodgment of power where it can be exercised with authority and dispatch is an essential requisite to the complete consummation of the object and purpose of the law.

The gentleman from Colorado would have the intervention of a jury, to speak by its verdict touching the truth of the alleged illness or diseased condition of the bovine whose reputation for soundness had been drawn in question. It would occur to an ordinary practitioner who has followed one case from the impaneling of a jury through courts by appeal or error to its reversal for proceedings de novo and again through the same routine, that this manner of procedure is not well adapted to the disposition of a matter where dispatch is of the great and prime importance to the success of the measure.

The extirpation of this disease in Massachusetts by State authorities has been cited to establish the proposition that this whole matter can safely be lodged with State authorities. Admitting that Massachusetts has done what is claimed, it establishes nothing that even tends to the proposition when applied to the great cattle-growing portion of the country. What has Massachusetts of the cattle industry of this country? Not enough to make a breakfast for the people of the United States—261,000 head of cattle and over 1,300,000 population.

Mr. LONG. One million eight hundred thousand.

Mr. WEAVER. Which has a population, I am told, of 1,800,000—seven human beings to one horned animal. No, sir, this illustration calling attention to what Massachusetts has done is as weak as their cattle industry. I admit that where seven human beings can be summoned to look after one sick calf there ought to be no need for quarantine regulations, and this is not said to belittle Massachusetts, but to call attention to the fact that the cattle business of Massachusetts is of so small importance as hardly to be spoken of as one of her industries.

How could the argument as to what has been done in Massachusetts with any kind of fairness be applied to the necessities of the great cattle-growing States of the West. Take the great State of Nebraska, for an example, with one-fourth of the population of Massachusetts and her 700,000 head of cattle—a State where between 1870 and 1880 there was an increase in cattle of over 800 per cent.; where five hundred cattle don't make a large herd, but where a single herd under one charge often embraces thousands of head.

Now, sir, what will be the consequences if this contagious disease shall once reach these great herds where no personal attention is sufficient to guard against the terrible consequences? The result will be that you New England men who peddle jack-knives to us Western folks for something to eat will wake up some morning and find that you have no meat for breakfast. How does this Massachusetts argument apply to the great State of Kansas with her 1,500,000 cattle, to Illinois with her 2,500,000 head, to Missouri with her 2,000,000 head; how does it apply to any of the great cattle-growing States of the West?

In Massachusetts, if all their steers and stags and bulls were cows, there would be only one cow to a family of seven—scarcely enough to furnish milk for the babies. The Massachusetts case does not appear to fit the case under consideration.

Now let us look at Connecticut, a State whose cattle industry sustains about the same relation to her population as does that of Massachusetts, and whose member [Mr. EATON] appears to be on very intimate terms with the goddess Pallas, this great and good feminine who is ever represented as having a pike in her right hand and a spindle in her left—weapons no doubt used to prod the escort who does not blow his horn long and loud for the "palladium;" and I think the venerable old goddess must have been bearing lightly on the prod, because the gentleman from Connecticut not only declared himself strongly in favor of the "palladium," but wanted it distinctly understood that his constituents ask no aid from the General Government, a fact that is easily accounted for when we notice from the census return that the cattle industry is one of the waning industries of that State.

Twenty years ago there were 30,000 more cattle in the State of Connecticut than there are to-day, a decrease of over 9½ per cent., and at this rate it will not be long before the whole State can give its attention to the nursing of one old sick cow with the pleuro-pneumonia. But on the other hand I notice from the census returns that in Connecticut there has been an increase of asses during the same period of twenty years of over 550 per cent. [Laughter.] I do not speak of this to account for the argument of the gentleman from Connecticut, but only to show that while the cattle industry of Connecticut is small and constantly diminishing, the principal industry is in propagating asses. [Laughter.]

It has been the subject of some inquiry as to what causes this terrible breeze from Texas in opposition to the proposed legislation in this bill; but a remark made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], when he said, "Why not confine the provisions of this bill to pleuro-pneumonia?" accounts for the gale. We find in the bill a provision that not only guards against the pleuro-pneumonia but as well against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases; and it is a well-known fact to the people of Kansas, Nebraska, and Missouri that Texas horses and Texas cattle have from year to year been driven into these States with the Texas mange, or itch, or the Spanish fever, and that these States have suffered great loss by the communication of these diseases to the native herds. The truth is, we desire to be guarded as well against the diseased cattle of Texas as against the diseased cattle of any other portion of the country.

This bugbear of an infraction of the Constitution is but a pretext. The Constitution lodges with Congress the exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce. The Supreme Court has said, in the case of The Railroad Company vs. Husen, 5 Otto, that the very measures proposed in this bill are such as belong to regulation at the hands of Congress, and in support to my proposition I will read a part of the decision in the case of The Railroad Company vs. Husen, 5 Otto, page 496. Speaking of this provision of the statute of Missouri—

> If any person or persons shall bring into this State any Texas, Mexican, or Indian cattle in violation of the first section of this act, he or they shall be liable in all cases for all damages sustained on account of disease communicated by said cattle—

The court says on this section:

> It seems hardly necessary to argue at length that unless the statute can be justified as a legitimate exercise of the police power of the State it is a usurpation of the power vested exclusively in Congress. It is a plain regulation of interstate commerce, a regulation extending to prohibition. Whatever may be the power of a State over commerce that is completely internal, it can no more prohibit or regulate that which is interstate than it can that which is with foreign nations. Power over one is given by the Constitution of the United States to Congress in the same words in which it is given over the other, and in both cases it is necessarily exclusive. That the transportation of cattle from one State to another is a branch of interstate commerce is undeniable, and no attempt has been made in this case to deny it.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], while admitting that Congress can regulate interstate commerce, claims that this bill goes further, and usurps the power reserved to the States by exercising the function of police regulations belonging to the States. I am sorry that a gentleman of the standing of Mr. REAGAN before the country and in the midst of his usefulness exhibits by such unmistakable evidence the loss of analytical power. I aver there is no authority given in the bill for the exercise of any power other than the power given in the fourth section to prevent the removal of cattle from an infected district across the line into another State or Territory, except the power to collect information upon which to base the exercise of power given in the fourth section. Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] admits that the power granted in the fourth section has the warrant of the Constitution, but denies to the General Government the power to acquaint itself with the facts essential to the intelligent exercise of this power. And as the whole objection to the bill, so far as Mr. REAGAN is concerned, is lodged against the first four sections of the bill, I produce them here to the end that what I have said may be verified by reading of the same:

> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief thereof, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, and whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among them, and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country; and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose. The salary of the chief of said bureau shall be $3,000 per annum; and the Commissioner shall appoint a clerk for said bureau, with a salary of $1,500 per annum.
> SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint two competent agents, who shall be practical stock-raisers or experienced business men familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live stock, whose duty it shall be, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases. The compensation of said agents shall be at the rate of $10 per diem, with all necessary expenses, while engaged in the actual performance of their duties under this act.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, in paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to extirpate the disease: Provided, That the authorities of said State or Territory shall assume and pay one-half of the expense of the valuation of the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and one-half the cost of disinfection and necessary police regulations in the quarantine and care of infected herds of cattle.

SEC. 4. That whenever a State or Territory, in any section of which a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the anmal industries of the nation, fails to make provisions for its extirpation, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such diseases, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory or such part of such State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

Now it will readily be seen that the gist of the first section is the power to erect a bureau of animal industry, with a chief, who shall inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among animals and the means for the prevention and cure of the same—nothing more than statistical information which the people of the whole country ought to be put in possession of.

The substance of the second section is nothing more nor less than to require at the hands of the agents appointed by the Commissioner of Agriculture a report as to the means and appliances best adapted to the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and to prevent the spread of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among cattle. Now let the great constitutional lawyers tell how a report of this kind is going to overturn the Constitution.

The substance of the third section requires the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules as he may deem necessary for the suppression and extirpation of the disease, and to invite the executive authorities of the States and Territories to join in bringing about that result. And if there be anything here to disturb the peace or offend the dignity of any great State, then I say let it come for the great good that will grow out of the adoption and crystallization of this act into a general law. It being clearly shown that there is no power granted in the first three sections of the act in violation of the Constitution, and it being admitted on the other side that the power granted in the fourth section is clearly within the power given to Congress by the Constitution, and no objection being urged against other sections embraced in the bill, it seems to me that this bill should be supported by both sides of the House.

It has been suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] that for the good of the country a few second-class funerals of the barnacle element of the Democratic party would be of great advantage. And I would suggest to the gentlemen on the other side of the House, especially the great constitutional objectors and those who seek to make this a party measure, that if they succeed in defeating this bill all necessity for local funerals in the Democratic party will be done away with by the general funeral that will be awaiting them at the hands of the farmers of this country next November. The gentlemen who have made the most noise in opposition to this measure will come to the same conclusion that the boy did, who, while milking a cow, tied the tail to his leg, and, after being dragged around the cow-yard three or four times, exclaimed that he had made a hell of a mistake.

The great agricultural interests, which have ever been neglected at the hands of Congress, will not stand much more nonsense.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, at the time of the adjournment yesterday I intimated to the then presiding officer I desired to speak for a moment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE]. The range of the debate this morning has gone far beyond the section under consideration, and I respectfully submit to gentlemen who are raising constitutional questions on the bill they should postpone those discussions until we reach the section that is claimed to be obnoxious to the constitutional objection.

For the present the first section and the second, I apprehend, are liable to no objection whatever.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish gentlemen to appreciate the circumstances which have called for the presentation of this bill. We are subjected in nearly every country in Europe to something approaching prohibition in the entry of some of our most important agricultural products, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars annually. Three years ago our Government was warned that such intentions were then entertained abroad; that they were being agitated and ripening; and that we would be brought very soon face to face with a condition where our exportation of meat products would be hindered, thwarted, and perhaps prohibited. Our Government was further warned of the necessity of taking early action in the United States for an inspection of some sort that would furnish a prima facie guarantee to foreign countries of the soundness and safety of our exportations to them. Now at last, in pursuance of the warnings then conveyed, we find ourselves confronted with this action of foreign governments prohibiting our exportations to them, and our markets are being taken away from us for the alleged reason that there is no legislation, state or national, that makes out a prima facie case for the producers of these articles in the United States. Your Agricultural Committee, recognizing the dangerous condition of affairs, and the weak point of our position in relation to foreign countries upon this subject, have brought in this bill for the purpose of remedying that defect and putting our commerce upon a safe basis. When this simple proposition is presented to us, gentlemen on the other side are found rising here to discuss general constitutional theories and the doctrine of State rights.

Why, sir, I can not but doubt the patriotism of that member who will not patiently and honestly attempt to cure this bill in the precise place where it needs curing, if he can find it open to such objections, and then co-operate with the committee in the great purpose it has in view of removing the burden and restriction upon one of the most important branches of our domestic industries. My friend from Connecticut, who does know something of our national industries, ought to pause before attempting to abridge any of the constitutional rights which we may possess to accomplish the great purposes sought by this bill. He ought to pause until he can put his finger upon the very clause of the bill that is obnoxious to the criticisms that he makes.

Coming from a State, sir, that is seriously affected by the situation; from a district where my constituents have urged my action in behalf of the interests represented by this bill, I must beg to say to both sides of this House that I consider the great object to be accomplished justifies our going to the extreme verge of our constitutional authority to secure the beneficial results proposed by this bill in behalf of agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DUNHAM obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. KASSON.

Mr. KASSON. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy. I do not intend to take up much time in the discussion of this bill, and would like to conclude the few remarks I have to make. I wanted to say, Mr. Chairman, that Iowa has reached a point where it is more interested than any other State in the Union in the exportation of the products of swine, and that question is embraced in this bill. It is not often farmers come here demanding legislation in their interest. It is not often that you have presented to you their interests, embracing hundreds of millions of dollars, which are touched by a single bill; and when they do come here I ask that you do not feed them upon the husks of constitutional State-right objections.

There is, I venture to say, but one clause in the bill to which those gentlemen can direct their attention, and that is the third; and even that clause makes its own application conditional upon the consent of the State authorities. It can not, therefore, be a dangerous infringement. Besides that, Mr. Chairman, the Legislature of Iowa is now in session. We want this proposition to be enacted into law and to be submitted to that Legislature for its assent before its adjournment. That State is anxious to put itself under the protection of a law like this, because until we do it I tell gentlemen from my own experiences abroad, when I was the first required to discuss this question, you will find your diplomacy impaired and weakened and the representation of your country's interest blocked by the fact that you have no means whatever of guaranteeing the quality of your exportations. You can not hasten too much in the consideration of this measure, for a million of dollars a week, I venture to say, depend upon the consideration of the bill and your action upon it.

If, Mr. Chairman, I have not made the difficulty plain I beg to return to it. In foreign states, I believe without exception, they have an inspection system; they have laws for quarantining animals which are affected by contagious diseases. I know what those laws are. I sent them to the State Department three years ago. They are rigid. They will not allow a head of infected stock to pass a geographical quarantine line. Every prerogative of executive authority is exercised to prevent the approach or passage of infected animals. They save millions of dollars in value of their stock to the people by quarantining infected or suspected animals by districts.

We also must avail ourselves of every power in the American Constitution to protect our interests at home as well as our interests in exportation. The international object to be accomplished is to enable our Government to say to these foreign governments, "We, too, have inspection laws; we, too, have by our official agents found the condition of our stock; we are able to guarantee its condition, and we affirm upon the same authority as you do, official authority, that our exports are free from disease."

Without a bill like this, Mr. Chairman, you can not, I repeat it, put your executive government in a sure condition to demand justice from the foreign governments, and hold them liable for the certain infraction of treaties. I beg gentlemen, therefore, not to antagonize this bill with theoretical State-rights considerations, but to come to the one point where they say the committee has exceeded constitutional power, and then fairly and honestly consider it independently of all party considerations and amend it if it needs amendment; and we shall have a bill worth more to the interests of this country than any bill I know now to be pending in this House.

It is for these reasons I remonstrate with gentlemen against bringing external considerations to bear against a measure of this importance to our farming interests, and appeal to them to hasten its consideration and to enable Legislatures of States which are now in session to consider it and, under the third clause, to agree with the provisions of the bill if it meets their approving judgment.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I desire to have read for the information of the committee a telegram which has been handed me by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WARD].

The Clerk read as follows:

LA FAYETTE, IND., February 26, 1884.

Hon. T. B. WARD, M. C.:

The cattle interests of this country, and of Indiana especially, demand the passage of the cattle bill now pending. We request the Indiana members to support the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, Mr. WELLER, and Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to have a letter read——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER].

Mr. REAGAN. Is the Democratic side of the House not to be permitted recognition?

Mr. VALENTINE. The Chair has just now recognized a Democrat.

Mr. WELLER. The gentleman from Texas will find I have enough of the old-fashioned Jacksonian Democracy about me for an average Democrat. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is trying to carry out the usage of alternating from side to side of the House. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] very soon. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] will proceed.

Mr. WELLER. I have listened with pain and with pleasure to the remarks that have been made by various gentlemen on the floor of this House. I myself am mindful that the Constitution should be looked at most carefully in all questions involving at least as much as does the question presented in this bill. But, laying aside the constitutional question for gentlemen that are abler than myself, I desire to come to some of the practical questions that present themselves to my attention as a practical farmer.

The question I desired to ask of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. WEAVER] was this: Can he point out to me anything is this bill making a provision for the suppression and extirpation of any disease except pleuro-pneumonia?

Mr. WEAVER. Oh, it is full of it.

Mr. WELLER. I should like, however, to have the gentleman answer my question in his own time and not in mine, and I treat the gentleman with the same consideration with which he treated me. I should like to have him point out anything anywhere in this bill that makes a provision for the suppression and extirpation of any disease except pleuro-pneumonia.

I am now getting a little more in earnest than ever before upon this question. I have a very lively interest in this bill and its provisions. It is very cunningly and very shrewdly worded. It says, "for the suppression of the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia." And it further says, "to provide against the spread of other contagious diseases."

I want to call the attention of gentlemen representing the interests of the great Northwest to that particular feature of this bill. Suppose I have a herd of hogs. They may be attacked with cholera. I shall take such care of them as that they appear to be well of it. I find a number ready for shipment. I put them on the cars and start them for Chicago. On the way to Chicago the disease known as cholera breaks out among those hogs. By the provisions in the seventh, eighth, and tenth sections of this bill I then can be brought up on the information of any person by the action of the district attorney in the premises and subjected to prosecution and persecution. There is not a single provision in this bill whereby I as a farmer can have immunity against this prosecution and this persecution; not a single provision. I defy any gentleman to point it out. It is not there.

I will go further, Mr. Chairman, and be plainer than ever before. I believe this bill has in it matters that are in the interest of a cattle ring being formed in the West, that they may control the cattle trade of the great Northwest as similar rings have controlled all the other industries of that great section. What provision is there in this bill against the disease known as hog-cholera and diseases of a character like that? What is there in this bill touching the sheep industries of this country? Not a single provision in it touching those industries except to suppress them. You use $250,000 to deal with pleuro-pneumonia, to pay men for slaughtering their cattle or to pay officers of the Government to slaughter them, but there is not a single thing in this bill in regard to the matter of sheep industry. Not a single thing in it in regard to horses and mules, the class of animals so facetiously referred to by the gentleman from Nebraska.

I appeal to Representatives on this floor of the people from the great Northwest to look at this bill carefully and search it thoroughly; and my opinion is that when they have thus done they will find that the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD] and the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut, my native State [Mr. EATON] gave them good counsel touching the constitutional matters involved in this proposed legislation. They will find further that I have warned them wisely and well and timely not to pass this bill in its present form.

I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture, and am not at liberty to speak of proceedings in the committee-room. I can, however, speak by amendment, if permitted, which I shall do in successive order until every feature of this bill has been touched upon.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELLWOOD. Mr. Chairman, if it had been possible for me to secure the floor during the progress of the general debate on the pending measure I would have been glad to have presented my views at length on the several provisions it embraces and to state fully the objections I entertain to it as it comes from the Committee on Agriculture. As it is, I shall have to content myself under the rules of the House with briefly calling attention in the five minutes to which I am limited to the several amendments which I shall propose looking to the perfection of the bill in case it shall become a law.

In the first place, sir, I shall move to strike out all of section 3 from the word "act." That is to say, I shall move to strike from the bill the following words:

Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations in paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to extirpate the disease: Provided, That the authorities of said State or Territory shall assume and pay one-half of the expense of the valuation of the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and one-half the cost of disinfection and necessary police regulations in the quarantine and care of infected herds of cattle.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. It is that we have not reached in regular order in the discussion of this bill section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ELLWOOD] in debate has the right to refer, as he is doing, to any of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. ELLWOOD. I also propose, Mr. Chairman, at the proper time to move an amendment to section 4. That section provides as follows:

That whenever a State or Territory in any section of which a contagious or infectious disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation fails to make provisions for its extirpation or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

It will be observed that in the latter portion it prohibits the transportation of diseased cattle from one State, Territory, or district to another, while it says not a word about diseased hogs. My amendment is for the purpose of curing that defect. For, sir, in the district I have the honor to represent on this floor there has been not only great inconvenience but serious loss arising from the importation and spread of contagious diseases among hogs. I shall move to amend by inserting the word "animals" instead of "cattle," so that whatever remedy there may be shall be extended equally to my district as well as to others.

I frankly confess I do not comprehend the exact scope and meaning of section 7, and I shall await explanation of it to determine my vote on it as well as on section 8.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, seems to me to be loosely and carelessly drawn. In one portion it uses the word "cattle," in another the designation is "animal," and then again in still another there is an entirely different expression. It ought to be made more clear and explicit.

My district, Mr. Chairman, is deeply interested in this subject. It has suffered more loss from cholera among hogs than any State or Territory has from pleuro-pneumonia or Texas fever among cattle. And I desire to impress the House with the fact that I realize to the fullest extent the importance and absolute necessity of speedy action to stay the spread of contagious diseases among meat-producing animals in this country. But I am decidedly opposed to turning this General Government into a great slaughter-house of all sorts of animals. When we appropriate $250,000 to defray the expenses of such a commission I advise you in time we shall open the door for the expenditure of $250,000,000. Indeed, there will be no limit to the expenditure that will be incurred. I have not time to go into detail, but if gentlemen will examine the report of the Committee on Agriculture they will reach the same conclusion.

Take, for instance, herds of any one stock-raiser, and there are many with 30,000 to 100,000 head each, and what will be the result? The bill provides that all diseased cattle and all cattle exposed to contamination and likely to cause the spread of the disease may be slaughtered by this commission. If that be carried out literally who can measure the expenditure of public money it will require?

It is true it is also provided that the State or Territory involved shall indorse the proposed action. What nonsense! Suppose there are 100,000,000 head of cattle, and that is not overestimating the number which may be slaughtered by this commission, and that after they have been destroyed the States and Territories should refuse or neglect to pay their one-half of the value of those cattle, do we not all know the result would be that the owners of those cattle would come to the Congress of the United States, which had created the commission, and ask that remuneration should be made out of the public Treasury for the loss which had been incurred? This House would be crowded with claims for compensation for cattle authorized to be slaughtered under the commission which is here provided. We might as well know in time just what we are doing.

It is stated in the report of the committee there are places in New Jersey and New York where three or four hundred cows have been destroyed in order to "stamp out" the disease of pleuro-pneumonia. Well, is there a member of this House who does not know those milch-cows in the city of New York are fed upon distillery slops, and that these slops produce the lung disease of which these cattle die? If under this bill a herd of cattle of four or five hundred head is condemned, slaughtered, and paid for, and the owner is to be allowed to fill his stables with other cattle, is the Government to continue to condemn and destroy and pay for them without limit?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ELLWOOD. I regret it, as I had much more to say.

Mr. REAGAN. I appeal to gentlemen to remember that this bill relates to something of importance, and ought to be treated seriously. I assume that Congress is capable of passing a law which will reach as far as Congress can go in correcting this evil and without a palpable violation of the Constitution. I am not at all surprised that many gentlemen on the other side of this House ridicule the idea of appealing to the Constitution for any purpose. I know their habitual disrespect for it. Yet it might be remembered that each one of us, on entering upon our duties here as members of this House, took a solemn oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

I agree that the article of the Constitution giving Congress power to regulate commerce among the States confers upon Congress all the powers which the States originally had for the regulation of commerce. But it does not confer upon Congress the power to go into a State and make local regulations and take local action within the State, as this bill proposes to do.

I am a little surprised that the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and the one from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] with their long experience here and their acknowledged ability ignore the fact that this bill proposes to go into the States and undertake local regulation of State property and citizens of the State not at all within the power of Congress.

Take the first section of the bill, where it is provided—

That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief thereof, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, and whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among them, and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, &c.

This provision authorizes the Commissioner by his agents to go into each State—not to take charge of interstate commerce, but to perform all that a local State tribunal could perform.

Mr. KASSON. We do the same thing in taking the census every ten years.

Mr. REAGAN. To go into a State for the purpose of taking the census is one thing; to go into a State for the purpose of doctoring cattle and hogs is another thing.

Mr. BLAND. The Constitution requires the census to be taken.

Mr. KASSON. In this section the purpose is merely to obtain information. These agents of the General Government are to do nothing but get information.

Mr. REAGAN. I have only five minutes, and I prefer not to be interrupted.

Under the second section of the bill the commissioner is—

To examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases.

Not in the District of Columbia, not in the Territories, but in the body of the States. This is clearly beyond the power of Congress.

It has been said that these things are all to be done by the consent of the States. The third section does make some provision for obtaining the consent of the States——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLANCHARD obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. REAGAN. The fourth section of the bill provides what shall be done if the States refuse to give their consent. The provision is:

That whenever a State or Territory in any section of which a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease exists, which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, fails to make provisions for its extirpation or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

This provision is in the nature of a penalty inflicted upon a State for not consenting to a violation of the Federal Constitution.

While thus criticising the bill let me say I would be glad if the committee would allow the bill to be recommitted, and would give us a bill adapted to carrying out the purposes which we can execute, and let us pass such a measure. Gentlemen appeal to us in the interest of agriculture to violate the Constitution and our oaths. This is an appeal which ought not to be made by members on this floor, however foolish people outside may be allowed to do it.

What Congress can do is to provide for inspection, if it deems it necessary to do so, and to prohibit the transportation of diseased animals from State to State or to foreign countries. That Congress can do. Why not do it? Why ridicule the Constitution? Why appeal to us in the interest of agriculture to violate it, when the means of doing what Congress is authorized to do is so palpably before us?

I am sorry the time has come when the poor old Constitution has to be treated with such disrespect and contempt as it is; but it has been used to it a good while, and I suppose can stand it some time longer.

I repeat the point with which I started out, that Congress may regulate commerce among the States and has all the power necessary for that purpose, but the power to regulate commerce among the States does not include the power to go down into the body of the States and regulate matters locally there. That is a matter for the States. After Congress has made its regulations for inspection, the States then, under their power to adopt police regulations, as has been stated, have the power, independently of Congress, to prohibit the introduction of diseased animals. But it seems very difficult for some gentlemen to understand that though the Supreme Court has decided that animals of all descriptions can not be prohibited by State law from coming into a State, the State may prohibit diseased animals from being brought in. Yet there is no principle clearer or better settled upon authority than that the States, under their police powers, can take care of the health of their people and the safety of their property.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, I am very earnestly interested in the passage of this bill. My estimate of its value and importance has constantly increased as the debate has gone forward. I am in favor of its passage substantially as it comes from the hands of the committee.

What is the case? All concede that the cattle-raising interest of the United States is one of our largest industries. It is also admitted that contagious diseases among cattle exist, and that one of these, pleuro-pneumonia, has found a lodgment in this country. It is in some of the New England States, in New York, in New Jersey, in Pennsylvania, in Virginia, in the District of Columbia, and at other points. It is malignant and contagious, and is rapidly communicated from one herd of cattle to another and from one locality to another. Something must be done—done quickly, done effectually—or this disease will encompass the whole land and ruin this great branch of business.

It is also shown that the States in and of themselves are unable to accomplish the work of its extermination; for while they are able to to regulate in a certain degree matters within their own boundaries, they are unable to protect themselves from the disease as it comes from other States and countries.

It becomes, therefore, a question of paramount national importance, requiring national legislation. Any measure to be effective must reach over the entire country and be applicable to all portions. Now, what are the arguments made against the passage of this bill? The only one that I have heard that amounts to an argument at all is that it is unconstitutional in that it is an invasion of the rights of the States.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] the other day, and I have a very high regard for his ability and his knowledge as a constitutional lawyer, declared that the State of Connecticut was sovereign, that Missouri was sovereign, that the other States were sovereign, and that the General Government was a mere confederation. And the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD] on last Saturday, in his argument against the bill, declared that the highest right of sovereignty did not belong to the General Government at all; that it was the exclusive prerogative of the States alone. I am amazed at such a position. Twenty-five or thirty years ago this doctrine was very common in this House and in this country. But times have changed. We have gone through some sad and bloody experience since then. We have been making history, and I assert that this doctrine of State sovereignty, this extreme ground, this doctrine which places the States above the General Government, which makes the States omnipotent, all powerful, and the General Government subordinate, insignificant, and powerless, has been settled by the stern arbitrament of battle. It has been tried, convicted, condemned, and shot to death by a million men in blue. We are a nation now, thank God, with power enough and authority enough and I hope disposition enough to legislate for and promote and advance all the great material and business interests of this mighty country and this whole people.

The great central thought of the Constitution of the United States is the promotion of the good of the whole people, and the supreme purpose of the National Legislature and of the Executive Departments of the Government should be not only to promote those interests, but to protect the people of this land from this or any other common danger, whether it approaches us in the form of pestilence, or war, or famine, or flood.

The distinguished gentleman from the State of Texas [Mr. REAGAN] told us the other day that the friends of this measure did not know anything about the Constitution of the United States, and to-day he speaks of our habitual disrespect for that sacred instrument. Let me say, in all kindness, I do not profess to be a great constitutional lawyer, but I know enough about the Constitution of my country to love it, to honor it, to obey it. I was not raised in that school of politics which teaches that a man may swear to support and maintain the Constitution and then turn and rend it and seek the overthrow of the Government of which it is the majestic framework. [Applause.]

We have, in my judgment, abundant constitutional authority for this legislation, and the right and the principle have been exercised over and over again by the Congress of the United States and by the executive authority. Why, sir, cholera does not stop at State lines, yellow fever does not stop at State lines, but they move on at midnight and at morning, laying whole sections in sackcloth and desolation. And what do you do? You unlock the doors of the Treasury and take money therefrom to provide for the relief of the sufferers. When the snows on the mountains melt and the rivers and streams of the land are full, the mighty volume of the flood does not stop when it comes to the boundaries of a State, but sweeps onward to right and left, burying farms and homes and carrying destruction and misery in its desolating path. What do you do? You open again the doors of the Treasury and take millions from it for the benefit of the people, for the relief of the sufferers and to strengthen the river banks. Commerce is not bounded by State lines, business is not bounded by State lines, and I hope the common prosperity of this country will not be interfered with or hampered by State lines or boundaries.

Now, here is a mighty industry—one of the largest in the world. Millions of people are engaged in it and supported by it. The States in their separate capacities can not control it. And when State Legislatures are urging Congress to act, when conventions are held to consider the subject, when petitions are coming up from every quarter, if Congress shall refuse to grant the prayer of the people and give the relief demanded there are thousands in every State and Territory who will ask the reason why, and it will not be considered a sufficient or satisfactory answer to say that State lines and State sovereignty stand in the way of this necessary and important legislation.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I received a petition signed by some two hundred gentlemen interested in the live-stock business in the city of Chicago protesting against the passage of this bill. They did not object to the Government doing something in this way, but they objected to this particular bill. More recently I have received a communication signed by a part of those same gentlemen requesting the withdrawal of their names from that protesting petition, therefore I have not presented it to this House. Those withdrawing have become convinced, on second thought, this bill or one similar is necessary and should be passed in order that something may be done to stamp out the further spread of disease among cattle. There may be clauses in the bill now before the House objectionable to some; if so, experience may prove it hereafter and proper amendments may be made. Serious financial damage has already been caused by this dread cattle disease, and the subject is one that will not bear delay in handling.

Fortunately or unfortunately, I do not know which, I am not a lawyer, and therefore naturally I am not worrying about the Constitution when I come to consider questions of interest to the people. I am not sitting up nights thinking whether by the adoption of some measure in this House which is for the benefit of the masses of the people of this country the Constitution is thereby going to be violated.

As I read the history of the men who framed our Constitution I am led to believe they were men of liberal ideas, and that it was their intention to have its provisions so construed as that this grand Government should be able to protect its citizens. Commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests have always received its fostering care and protection. Why, I ask, should there be any doubt about its authority to defend the health and the lives of our people?

The question that presents itself to my mind now is, does this pleuro-pneumonia exist in this country as a matter of fact? If it does exist, then is it the duty of Congress to sit idly and let it go on and spread over the whole land or is it our duty to attempt to stamp it out? The section from which I come has had no trouble so far with this disease, and we are anxious that we shall have the means of keeping it away from us altogether. The Eastern States alone have suffered, and will be in more danger unless something of this kind is done. If the States of themselves are not disposed or able to do the work, let the United States Government step in, assert its power, and accomplish this beneficial object. Disease in cattle unchecked may in the future prove dangerous to our people in their meat supplies. Monetary interests as well as sanitary reasons demand that our cattle be kept healthy.

Certain countries in Europe have prohibited, under false pretenses, the importation of our pork products. Now, for one, I object to allowing them to have a chance to prohibit the importation of our cattle, and have a really substantial reason for it. In prohibiting the pork products they have done it under a fraud, and I think it is our duty to pass such bills in this House and this Congress as that they will have no opportunity whatever to prohibit the importation of our cattle. For these reasons and many others that the limited time at my disposal will not admit of my stating, I think it better to adopt this bill with such amendments as the committee have offered rather than run the risk of having nothing.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I should dislike to spend any more of the time of the House in the discussion of this matter if it were not that it is my earnest wish to remove some misapprehensions that seem to exist in the minds of gentlemen against the present provisions of the bill, and, too, who should be the guardians instead of being the executioners of it.

My colleague from Iowa objects to the seventh section of the bill because, as he says, if he starts to Chicago with a cargo of hogs and the cholera breaks out among them while in transit they will arrest and prosecute him because of the fact of his shipping diseased swine. But I can assure the gentleman if he looks carefully at the provisions of the bill he will find nothing of the kind. No man can be prosecuted or persecuted for the transportation of animals that he does not know to be diseased. I am sorry he takes this position, because we understood that he was going to help us pass the bill, and criticism of this kind will only distract. The farmers of our State expect us to help to secure legislation that will turn aside a threatened danger, and we can wait to discuss in less precious time our party leanings. Our farmers seldom ask specific legislation, and when they do nice distinctions concerning politics should not turn them away empty.

I do not believe in bringing up partisan considerations in the discussion of an industrial measure of any character, and especially one of such importance as this. I want to vote to pass a bill that will reach the results we all seek to accomplish without taking fine sights.

I wish that my friends on this floor would come to look at this thing in the same light that the African chief looked at the same question when Livingstone was prosecuting his researches and discoveries in Africa. When Livingstone and his party had come within three hundred miles of him this old chief told his people that there he must be stopped and the bullocks taken from his wagons, because he was afraid that they would bring pleuro-pneumonia into his dominions, and he had his own people drag the wagons three hundred miles rather than run the risk of introducing pleuro-pneumonia and destroying his cattle, as it had in other parts of that continent. History tells us that the famous white Scotch cattle on the estate of the Duke of Hamilton that have been there for seven hundred years had to be lowered into a coal-pit, so much afraid was their owner of the approach of this dreaded disease. The plague is as terrible now as ever it was. Every nation of Europe is alarmed about it, and all are taking measures to check its introduction and spread.

It seems a little singular, Mr. Chairman, when all our meat exports are under suspicion abroad, when the best meat products under the sun are discounted, when they are commercially degraded, that we can not do something to protect ourselves and place them in that position that they ought to occupy with reference to the rest of the commerce of this country. But gentlemen raise the question of infraction of State rights. I do not stand second to any man in the House in admiration of local self-government and of State rights. I know the benefit of it. I know it is the way by which the nations of the Old World are to be elevated. But, Mr. Chairman, are we to take a position here that when something goes beyond the power of individuals and communities or even States to regulate we can find no remedy because it is claimed it infringes upon the rights of the States? Are we to permit this lung-plague to decimate and destroy our herds that are so important in our national economy and so necessary to our national prosperity because a great danger requires vigorous treatment? Are we to allow this disease to spread beyond the Alleghanies into the great American breeding-grounds simply because we are afraid that some official may kill a cow too many or too promptly? Why, Mr. Chairman, we have taken abundant care in the preparation of this bill that that shall not be done. If there was any real effort being made to interfere with the rights of the States I would cross that aisle in a moment and vote with the Democrats against it. But there is none.

I appeal to you, gentlemen, do not send the farmers of this country away empty handed. Give us something that is needed for our protection, to protect our herds in the Northwest from the spread of this diease. I do not desire to buy party capital at such a terrible price as the failure of this measure would amount to. It was said lately in the other branch of Congress that nothing is ever done for the farmers of the country. They can be kicked often with impunity, but they do occasionally wake up, and when they do there is a reckoning. Let us make the bill as good as we can and consider it in the light of a public necessity, and pass it in the shadow of a threatened calamity.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to ask my colleague from Iowa this question: Is there any provision in this bill which he has discovered for the suppression and extirpation of any disease except that of pleuro-pneumonia?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The provisions of the bill comprehend all the diseases of our domestic animals—all of them—and the machinery to be constructed will deal with the dangers as they arise in future. Lung-plague is that which threatens now, and it is most emphasized in this bill.

Mr. WELLER. For their suppression and extirpation?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The provisions of the bill embrace all the contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases of domestic animals. The gentleman will find the provisions as to those diseases in the second section.

Mr. VALENTINE. During the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses I had the honor to be a member of the Committee on Agriculture, and I was also a member of the subcommittee having in charge the question of pleuro-pneumonia. I had very much desired to speak at length upon this bill, but for some reason or other the gentleman in charge of it could not find time for me. I am therefore compelled to say what I have to say under the five-minute rule; and as I know that I can not in that time say what I would like to say touching the measure, I will confine myself particularly to one subject, leaving the discussion of the constitutional question to those who have addressed the committee heretofore.

I find in this bill nothing that I can not subscribe to with reference to the Constitution of this country. I believe there is nothing in this bill that is unconstitutional. I shall not stop to argue the question, but merely state that as my conclusion.

I believe that the people of this country are in immediate need of the passage of this or some bill which will regulate this disease of pleuro-pneumonia. While this bill goes further than that, and provides for the regulation of all contagious and communicable diseases among animals, I shall refer more particularly, in the short time I have, to that of pleuro-pneumonia.

About a year ago, or a little more than that, some citizens of Chicago employed one of the most experienced veterinary surgeons of that region and sent him here. He came to me and asked if I could point out to him the sections of this country where pleuro-pneumonia existed. He said he desired to examine some of the cattle affected by it. I told him he could find them here in this District or he could go across a few miles into Maryland and find there plenty of cattle affected with pleuro-pneumonia. He went over into the State of Maryland, and found he could not get into the stables, or "corrals," as we term them in the West; that the State of Maryland had passed a law touching the matter of pleuro-pneumonia; that the governor under the provisions of that act had selected a State veterinary surgeon; that they had found the disease did exist; that they had taken the cattle from the dairymen, slaughtered them, and paid them the pittance of $10 each for their cattle. Therefore he was excluded and could not reach what he desired in that way. Then he went down to the store, got a pair of stoga boots, put on overalls, and went out among farmers as a common cow-doctor—not a horse-doctor—taking some prescriptions of charcoal that he said were good for that disease. In that way he got into the good graces of the farmers, and spent more than sixty days investigating the question of pleuro-pneumonia. And he found that among the dairy cattle of Maryland, in the region surrounding this city, that disease existed largely. He found that when these cattle became so thoroughly diseased that they were no longer fruitful to their owners for giving milk, they were sold in the night to Jews, and taken out and slaughtered and sold to the citizens of Baltimore and this city for beef.

I say the members of Congress should not sit idle and prate about the Constitution in the consideration of a question like this. They should do something to relieve this community and this country from this terrible plague. I have no doubt that to-day you are drinking the milk from cattle affected by pleuro-pneumonia, cattle rotten with the disease, and that you are eating beef-steak cut from them.

Mr. BUDD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUDD. What is your authority for saying these cattle were sold to Jews? I wish to state that the Jews are the cleanest people in the world in the butchery of their cattle, and will not permit any diseased cattle or beef to be sold. The cattle slaughtered by their butchers must be inspected by the rabbi or other proper authority. I protest against these reflections on the Jews, as they are neither correct nor just.

Mr. VALENTINE. I referred to them because a large number of Jews are engaged in that business in Maryland. I mean no reflection at all upon the Jews.

Mr. BLAND. I sympathize in many of the arguments for this bill. It relates to a very important subject, and one that deserves the serious consideration of Congress. I think we ought to go as far as the first and second sections of the bill authorize; that we might provide for officers to investigate and report upon these diseases so far as they affect the transportation of cattle from one State to another, and the best mode of transportation and the mode of preventing disease from being communicated in transportation. This would be no more than the regulation of interstate commerce, and no doubt would be constitutional; and those provisions of the bill that look to restraining transportation lines, railroads, steamboat, and other lines, and the restraining of individuals transporting diseased cattle from one State to another and across the borders of a State in order to reach from one State to another, ought to be adopted. In so far as those objects of this bill are concerned I am in favor of it.

But the third and fourth sections are certainly very objectionable. I do not speak of the question involved by those sections with reference to any constitutional objection, but as a practical question. It does seem to me that the provision there made gives room for speculators, that it gives room for cattle rings. And when I understood that the brokers in Chicago were in favor of this bill I imagined it possible if it was thought necessary by those engaged in that business to bull the cattle market, so to speak, that they might get up information that in the State of Texas the Spanish fever, or the Texas fever, or something of that kind existed throughout that State, and might quarantine all the Texas cattle until the Chicago speculators got rid of a little surplus on hand.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Will my colleague allow me to correct him?

Mr. BLAND. Certainly.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. The protest to which the gentleman refers as having been signed by the cattle-brokers of Chicago is one against the passage of the bill, not in favor of it.

Mr. BLAND. But after reconsideration, however, they were favorable to the bill, as I suppose, seeing their opportunity in this regard.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Some of the signers asked to have their names taken off; that is all.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAND. Has my time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. This is a bill which excites great interest in my section of the country. The farmers of Michigan have over and over again expressed themselves favorable to a measure of this kind. That expression has been made by individuals and in the form of resolutions adopted by county and State agricultural associations. I can not see how any man representing such a constituency can do otherwise than advocate this bill.

It is not my purpose to speak generally upon this measure, but to call attention to certain specific features in it. There are one or two features of this bill which I have not heard mentioned in this discussion. This is a bill to suppress diseases among domestic animals, and it invokes three agencies to accomplish that purpose.

The first is the gathering of information and disseminating it among the people, information respecting these diseases of animals; secondly, the bill proposes to contribute aid to the States in the matter of destroying diseased animals. It does not contemplate that any officer of the United States Government shall even be instrumental in killing a diseased animal. That is only to be done by State authority, by State regulations, and only when the State consents to it.

There is one other agency brought to bear to accomplish the purpose of this bill, only one other. What is that? It is that provision to prevent the transportation of diseased animals from one State to another. In making this statement I do not overlook the provisions of the fourth section; but I undertake to say that if those provisions relating to quarantine were stricken from the bill, its purpose and effect would in no wise be changed.

This bill will accomplish nothing except what you punish; what you may forbid is of no importance. What you undertake to punish is all that will be regarded in the enforcement of this measure. What do you punish? Nowhere in this bill is there a provision for punishing the man who violates the quarantine regulations. The punishment is denounced against what is forbidden in the seventh section, and that seventh section does not embrace the violation of quarantined regulations.

The President may proclaim quarantine of a given portion of the State of New York, yet if I take a diseased animal from that portion of the State of New York to another part of the same State I shall not be subject to punishment under this bill. I may violate the quarantine, but I am not to be punished. If I take a healthy animal from a quarantined territory to a portion outside of it, I am not to be punished.

What is punished under this bill? The simple act of knowingly transporting diseased animals from one State to another; that is all. Is there any man on this floor who desires permission to take diseased animals and cart them over the country? That is all that is punished under the provisions of this bill, and this bill has no vitality outside of its sanction.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I desire at the proper time to submit a motion embraced in the proposition which I ask the Clerk now to read as a portion of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture with instructions to report a bill which shall embrace a more thorough system of inspection, to the end that no diseased animal shall be exported; and, further, to report a bill to organize a more strict quarantine against the importation of diseased animals, and to make such recommendations as will secure by the States such legislation as will eradicate the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Do I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has this read at this time simply for the information of the committee?

Mr. RANDALL. I have it read as a part of the remarks which I am about to make. If in order I would offer it at this time.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. If it is offered now I would make a point of order upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. The proper motion would be to move that the Committee of the Whole rise and report the bill to the House with this recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. That question came up in Committee of the Whole some time ago.

Mr. RANDALL. However, I do not want to take any parliamentary advantage in the matter, and I am willing to submit the proposition at any other time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that some fortnight ago a similar proposition was submitted in Committee of the Whole by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE], and the Chair then held it to be in order to move that the committee rise with a view to recommit the bill. The Chair, however, has subsequently examined the matter in a better light.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. A brighter light.

The CHAIRMAN. Better and brighter light and with much care, and has come to the conclusion that the point of order raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] is properly taken. On the former occasion the erroneous ruling of the Chair on the question affected nothing, as the vote immediately taken disposed of the matter. The Chair, however, is disinclined to leave on the record an erroneous ruling even upon an unimportant question, as it might hereafter be drawn into precedent when more important considerations were involved.

Mr. RANDALL. I submitted the proposition as a part of my remarks, and stated that when opportunity offered I would submit it for the consideration of the House.

My judgment never did approve of any action which was likely to result in proceedings looking to retaliation against foreign governments that had taken steps to prevent our meats and cattle from being imported into such countries. If I am correctly informed, all that these foreign governments ask of us, and all that we have a right to ask of them, is a thorough system of inspection on both sides. I am told that in Germany and in France the inspection of our cattle is very thorough, to such an extent as absolutely to prevent any diseased cattle from going in there. If we had regulations of that kind in this country I think we would have gone as far as we should go, and would have accomplished the result we all seek, that the exportation of cattle shall not be lessened, and that pleuro-pneumonia may be stamped out from our own agricultural fields.

Further than that I do not think we can practically go, even if we have constitutional power. There is a diversity of opinion here as to what should be done. I think we can all unite in the proposition I have suggested as not only within the constitutional power of Congress, but within our power of execution and administration.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, it was a little difficult to hear just what the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was. It is possible that it may come up at some stage of our proceedings when we shall be unable to answer his suggestions or to make any remarks in opposition to the proposition to recommit. I know the proposition is not in order now. If I correctly heard it as read by the Clerk, I think it is largely Utopian. The gentleman's proposition is to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to report back a bill which shall accomplish some great object in the direction of wiping out the disease called pleuro-pneumonia or other animal diseases, without fixing any sort of penalty at all. The gentleman proposes in some strange way to have mere language accomplish an object which in the view of most of us here requires to be accomplished by force under the direction of legislative and executive power.

But, Mr. Chairman, I rose to say that I have been in favor of a measure to hedge in and finally to stamp out this disease that is now threatening the whole cattle interest of this country. A number of years ago I had the honor to introduce in this House a bill on this subject of pleuro-pneumonia, one of the first bills, if not the very first, ever introduced in the House of Representatives on this subject. That bill was very simple in its terms. It looked only to hedging in the disease wherever it might be discovered to exist. All the live-stock associations all over the country, North and South, in Kentucky, Texas, and other places, considered that measure and passed resolutions favoring its adoption, declaring it a step in the right direction. The present bill goes a step further, and proposes to exercise in some mild form the power of the Government to prevent the great dangers that must come from the spread of this disease, especially in the great cattle regions of the West.

It is a matter of great importance to those who are raising cattle upon the plains and prairies of the West to know whether the Government is going to exercise power to prevent the spread of this disease into their great ranges, for if it is once introduced there it may involve practically the destruction of the whole cattle trade of America. "For years," some gentleman suggests; but I do not know the limit of years that may be required to wipe out this disease if thus disseminated. When it once gets into those large herds it may involve the destruction of all the cattle on the plains. The dispatches and letters that come to us appealing to us to do something in the way of preventing the spread of this disease make it of the gravest importance that we should look well to this bill.

I think the bill a mild one. I think it does not infringe the Constitution of the United States. I think it is very considerate of State powers, and I am not yet prepared to agree with distinguished gentlemen on the other side that there is any such thing as State power, either by police regulations or otherwise, to go into the herds and kill them off, any more than there is national power. It is a question of the right of property, and it is not to be determined by State any more than national authority. But if such measures become necessary to put an end to the disease that threatens one of the greatest interests of America, it will be found that the power can be exercised rightfully under the Constitution by the General Government better than in any other way.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Chairman, I feel that in justice to myself as a Representative of the State of New Jersey I should explain my reasons for voting against this bill. I hold in my hand a communication from the president of the board of health of my State requesting the Representatives from New Jersey in Congress to vote for this bill. I find that this officer has investigated the subject. One of his statements is to the effect that the transportation of cattle is from the West to the East, and not from the East to the West. From what he says, if the disease exists at all there are probably as many cases in my district as in any other in the United States. There is no transportation of those cattle from the East to the West, so that while it is a local evil in one State, the western part of the country, where cattle are mostly raised, is not all endangered by its existence in New York city and vicinity.

But, aside from that, I will vote against this bill on constitutional grounds, regardless of the request of the president of the State board of health, regardless of the fact that in my district there are so many cases of pleuro-pneumonia, if such a disease is really a fact. I know, Mr. Chairman, that this is the age of material politics and business interests, in which constitutional freedom is subordinated to the convenience of trade. We find that day after day this Congress is being asked to unify the laws of the United States on the plea of convenience. I, for one, will not listen to the plea of convenience when convenience infracts the Constitution of the United States. This Federal system, which is the foundation-stone of our liberties and our only bulwark against centralized despotism, may have its inconveniences, but is not home rule and individual liberty worth some sacrifice?

I think, sir, that the argument of the learned gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD] is unanswerable, that this bill does tend to centralization, and does not come under the constitutional regulation of commerce. It leaves to the President of the United States the liberty of making a police district of a State without the sanction of the Legislature or governor of that State.

Indeed, sir, this bill is on a par with the petition presented this morning for Congress to legislate in a general way on the subject of divorce. There are people in this country, unfortunately, who, on the plea of convenience and to suit their business interest or notion, would not hesitate about a constitutional question. Those people are honest business men; they do not look at it in any other view; they regard it from a material standpoint; and they do not care much about matters which infract the Constitution and seriously endanger perhaps the freedom and welfare of the people. They would wipe out State lines, unify all laws, look for all legislation to Washington, and drag fettered liberty at the wheels of triumphant trade.

I am reminded of what was said by my friend from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE] some days since, that the State-rights bantam had become in its own estimation as big as the cochin-china of the Federal power. I wish to say to him that this big cochin-china of Federal power may become a blustering bully, maintained by the liberal concession of confiding States, and repaying that liberality by unconstitutional domination. We want to prevent that if we can. Let him have his share of the roost, but not undertake to occupy the whole barn.

But it is said that the cattle interests of this country are more to be considered than the Constitution, if I understand the argument of some gentlemen. It is also said this bill is friendly to the States. I say it is not friendly to the States, but on the contrary is opposed to their constitutional rights. In the language of Scripture, "The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move the committee rise with the view of limiting debate. I think the House has indulged discussion long enough and that we ought now to come to some arrangement so that we may get on with the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman to allow the sense of the House to be taken on the proposition which I suggested in my remarks.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask consent to read a letter which I have received on this subject from one of the largest shorthorn cattle-breeders in the country. He happens to live in my district.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will read the letters myself.

SIDEVIEW, MONTGOMERY COUNTY, KENTUCKY, February 7, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: I would like to enlist your influence and action in behalf of the bill now before Congress to establish a bureau of animal industry and stamp out pleuro-pneumonia, a disease as fatal to cattle as the most contagious forms of Asiatic cholera is to humanity. That it has already got a foothold in the Atlantic States there is no doubt, and that we west of the Alleghanies have escaped it so far is only because it is only the last two or three years that any but thoroughbred cattle have been brought from east to west. Calves and stickers are now being brought from east to west at the rate of 6,000 per month through Chicago alone, and we can not escape it much longer only by such action as is proposed by Congress. On account of this disease Great Britain will only now allow our beef cattle to land at two ports, and they must be slaughtered in those two ports inside of fourteen days. The farmers of the whole West, on account of this British statute, lose $1 per hundred at least on every steer large enough to export. Stamp out this disease, and we can send our cattle anywhere in Great Britain. No one State or set of States can stamp it out, for even if they buy and slaughter all infected cattle, it is hardly done before an infected drove comes in from some other infected State. Hence action by the General Government is necessary to stamp it out of all the infected States together and at one time. The Government of Great Britain has found it necessary to take hold of the disease herself, but she put it off so long that in the years 1880, 1881, and 1882 she lost over $60,000,000 annually before she got it checked. It is estimated that since 1800 the continent of Europe has lost more by this disease among their cattle than by all its wars in the same period. One ox with the disease, thirty years since, landed in New Guinea, and destroyed totally cattle-raising in that country. The disease is so contagious that the droppings from a wagon-wheel passing through an infected lot of cattle into an uninfected will disease it. Whenever the disease breaks out in one lot no individual escapes; it is so insidious that on account of its lying dormant often in an animal from three weeks to three months, that any unprincipled salesman finding it in his lot will take the rest and can sell them with impunity to any one else.

When we consider that the cattle of the United States are worth over $1,000,000,000, and that our sales annually amount to over eight hundred millions, and that, our property being visible, we never escape taxation, it does seem Congress would grant us the pittance asked to stamp out the disease at home and give us such legislation as to protect our markets in foreign countries. When it is considered that our cattle are worth more than all the railroads and manufactories combined that are continually receiving aid from the General Government, why not protect us a little that never ask any gifts? In to-day's Cincinnati Gazette I see some of our Western Congressmen from Texas, Kansas, &c., opposing the bill. Do they know if the disease ever gets onto the great plains their Western cattle business is not only done but destroyed, and even this great Government of ours would not be able to stamp it out? If they have any doubts on this point, let them look up the history of this disease upon the steppes of Russia, in Germany, and in Great Britain. We can stamp it out now and at comparatively small cost while east of the Alleghanies. Should it get west of them the figures for this purpose would be almost incredible. The only trouble with the bill is it does not appropriate one-fifth enough and should be still stronger in its effects. Any one that will read the official reports of Great Britain upon this subject will have no doubt upon this point. In short, upon the legislation of Congress depends the prosperity of the great farming and stock interests of the United States. Stamp out the disease and protect us from discriminating foreign legislation, and we can make the whole country prosper as it never did before, and feed Europe, with Great Britain thrown in in addition, upon the best meats and choicest grains they ever knew.

I see Mr. BELFORD, of Colorado, day before yesterday took the ground the legislation asked was in behalf of Western cattle-kings and against the thoroughbreds. This is a great error. It is for all cattle of every kind. As the largest individual breeder of shorthorns in the United States, I totally deny his premises. It is for scrub, Texan, thoroughbred, and all kinds. I have so written him.

Yours, truly, T. CORWIN ANDERSON.

Hon. JOHN D. WHITE.

SIDEVIEW, MONTGOMERY COUNTY, KENTUCKY, February 14, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 6th received, and glad to know the bill will have your favorable consideration. There is nothing further from the objects of the bill or the views of its originators than to give cattle-kings or any one else the power to depress the beef or other meat markets. As one connected with the convention that framed it and been interested directly with the circumstances that brought it forth, I think I may confidently assure you of this fact. The real and only ultimate objects of the bill were to stamp out this disease where it exists, prevent its further spread, and by these means prevent the hostile English legislation toward our live export cattle with that of the German and French Governments toward our pork. Should these most beneficent objects be accomplished the cattle-men of every sort and all farmers that consume their own grain with either hogs or cattle can take care of themselves and need no further assistance from the Government than good legislation would naturally accomplish.

We have no statistics published that would give an accurate idea of the number of thoroughbred cattle in Kentucky, of shorthorns in Montgomery County. I make the thirteen largest herds to contain eight hundred and ninety head and worth in round numbers $261,100, without counting the Hamiltons of Flat Creek, that are usually considered as belonging to Mount Sterling, nor have I included any of the many small herds of five, eight, and ten individuals that have been begun in the past year or so. Bigstaff, myself, and Williams and Hamilton, A. W., have several cattle in this enumeration that have cost us at auction in the last three years from $1,000 to over $4,000 per head. My herd is the largest belonging to one man, having quite two hundred of all ages, and my surplus at auction of all ages and both sexes making an average per head of $308, $331, and $430 for the years 1881, 1882, and 1883. I mention these things as evidence of the value of our cattle at this time, and why we wanted to be protected from a disease that leaves no individual of a lot of cattle after once becoming infected. Montgomery County farmers have given more attention to shorthorns from 1880 to 1884 than ever before, while I think in the other blue-grass counties besides Bath the interest has diminished; notwithstanding out of the 3,800 shorthorns sold at $207 per head at auction during 1883 Kentucky furnished about one-third of them. Most of the States, though, sell largely at private sale, while the auction of shorthorns in Kentucky has become prevalent and the custom.

About Clark I have not the means to tell, nor any one except some one acquainted with the herds individually. At a guess, while much larger in area than Montgomery, I doubt whether she has more shorthorns since the dispersion of the large herds of Groome, Van Meter, Thomson, and Renick.

Hoping the success of our bill, I am, yours, truly,

T. C. ANDERSON.

Mr. WELLER. I ask the same courtesy may be extended to me that was extended to the gentleman from Kentucky, in order that I may have read an extract from the report of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WELLER. I ask particular attention to this extract from the committee's report:

Now, while it is true that pleuro-pneumonia has existed in the East for forty years without having been carried to the West, it must be admitted, from what has occurred so many times in Pennsylvania and Connecticut, that there has been danger of this, and that this danger is increasing with the larger number of cattle now being shipped in that direction. No doubt this danger has been exaggerated, but the fact that there is danger, and that the disease once carried to the Western herding grounds would probably be beyond our control, if we can judge from the experience of Australia and South Africa, is sufficient to show the importance of grappling with it while it can be so easily handled. The rapidity with which a disease spreads on these ranges when once introduced is illustrated by an occurrence of last summer in Southwestern Texas. A drove of cattle brought a communicable disease to that section which the Army surgeons believed to be contagious pleuro-pneumonia; but before any careful examinations could be made several hundred cattle had died and a large territory was infected. Fortunately, investigations showed that this was not pleuro-pneumonia, but a disease which does not outlast a single season of the year. If it had proved to be pleuro-pneumonia, would it not have been a national calamity? With a large territory already infected, with no money and no power to control the disease, and occurring in summer months before the State and national legislative bodies would convene, it is difficult to see how any effective measures could have been adopted.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the House resolve itself into committee for the further consideration of the special order; and, pending that motion, I move all debate on the pending section and amendments thereto be limited to ten minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution and bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Joint resolution (S. 70) expressing the appreciation of Congress and the people of the United States of the generous act of Her Britannic Majesty's Government in presenting to the United States the Arctic steamship Alert;

A bill (S. 233) providing for an enlargement and improvement of the post-office, custom-house, and court-house at New Haven, Conn;

A bill (S. 528) for the relief of Silas Q. Howe, surviving partner of William T. Pate & Co.;

A bill (S. 1014)) to authorize the State of California to select other lands in place of sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, returned as mineral; and

A bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations.

GIFT OF THE STEAMER ALERT.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, it would be an act of grace if we take from the Speaker's table the Senate resolution accepting the gift of the Alert from the British Government and pass it instantaneously.

Mr. KASSON. There is no objection.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The joint resolution of the Senate was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and, pending that motion, that all debate on the first section of the bill and all amendments thereto be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KEIFER. The motion does not contemplate an attempt to close debate on the entire bill?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. No; only on this section and the amendments to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WELLER. That was the very point I was about to raise.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the latter motion, which has just been stated.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate on this section and pending amendments and amendments which may be submitted thereto is limited to ten minutes.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, I desire but a very few minutes to express my views on this bill. It seeks to add another to the already large number of bureaus that we have provided by existing law under this Government. The bill styles it "the bureau of animal industry." It will require many and weighty considerations to induce me to give my consent to multiplying the number of bureaus already existing under our Government.

I know the tendency is always to increase the number rather than to diminish it; and that when they are once established there is a corresponding tendency on the part of the bureau itself to grow pretty rapidly, not only in the desire for increased dignity, as we now witness on the part of the Agricultural Bureau, which wishes to be made a part of the Cabinet, but also with reference to the matter of appropriations required for their support and maintenance. These annually increase, so that where $10,000 a few years ago was amply sufficient for all such purposes in any one bill, we find that they have increased their demands up into the hundreds of thousands of dollars, and are still increasing.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, I do not deny that the subject under consideration is not of importance enough to justify the establishment of another bureau. I believe with the gentleman from Connecticut that this bill is bad, very bad; but I do not believe that it is so bad that it is incapable of amendment. Now, if the friends of this bill are not willing to accept reasonable amendments which have been suggested by those who have spoken against it, I think by their very objection to such amendments the friends of this bill are indicating a desire or an inclination on their part that they do not want it to pass. I claim that if we give this bureau the power and the right of investigating the causes of contagious diseases among domestic animals; if we give the power that we have under the clause in the Constitution to "regulate commerce" among the States to prevent the transportation of diseased domestic animals from one State into another either by railroad or steamboat—and I admit that the transportation of cattle from one State into another and trade in them is "commerce"—and if in addition to that we give them the necessary machinery and means to carry out that plan, then I say we are giving to them all that the friends of this bill ought to ask. In this legislation not only the cattle interest, strictly so called, but the hog and sheep interests ought also to be embraced; and on that subject I have no doubt that the bill goes far enough to include such interests. But as there seems to be a doubt about the terms of the bill in this respect, it can be readily amended so as to provide for the protection of all these different interests in animals.

Now, the friends of the bill, if they are wise, will accept the amendments which have been offered, and which I believe will remove all the serious objections that this side have to the bill. That would include, I take it, the striking out of the fourth section.

I am sure the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] would not contend that any argument could be made here by the most latitudinarian constructionist that could fairly defend that section. I would like to know what the word "district," the last word in the fourth section, means. Does it mean that portion of the State or Territory which the President has the right to declare in quarantine? If it does, what is meant by the prohibition against driving or transporting cattle out of that "district?" Why, sir, I could conceive under that section a township or a county might constitute the infected district; and to say the President should have the right to prevent the exportation of cattle out of that district would be to say you had the right to control commerce, not merely between States, which no one disputes, but between the counties of a State.

Mr. KASSON. The suggestion last made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] is worthy undoubtedly of the consideration of the committee. The object of this section evidently was to accomplish as far as possible a limitation of the district affected by being declared in quarantine, and it refers, as I understand, to transportation to another State or Territory. It is designed to alleviate the difficulty which might arise if you made the provision relate exclusively to a State.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say I gave notice, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], that I would move to amend by adding at the end of that section, following the word "district," the words "into any other State or Territory."

Mr. REED. Or foreign country.

Mr. KASSON. I supposed that was intended. I only wish to say to the gentleman on my left [Mr. STORM] that he will find a hearty disposition on this side of the House among the friends of the bill to meet all fair and constitutional objections.

I rose mainly, however, for another purpose, to refer to a pending amendment offered by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], which is to strike out the words——

Mr. WELLER. That amendment has been voted down.

Mr. KASSON. That amendment proposed to strike out the words "investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use."

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. That has been disposed of.

Mr. GIBSON. You voted that down on your side.

Mr. STORM. The friends of the bill voted down that proposition.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentlemen permit me to say what I started with intimating I wished to say in connection with that and in answer to remarks of the gentleman from Texas, that this involves no additional expenditure and simply gives advantages which some gentlemen not from agricultural districts fail to appreciate. For example, in my own State we are large buyers of domestic animals from other States to bring there and fatten them on our usually abundant corn crop.

The information as to the condition, number, and value of the domestic animals of the United States will be of great importance to the people of those States that buy elsewhere for purposes of fattening.

There are at present, I wish to remind my friend from Texas, agents from the department in the various States of the Union ascertaining the quantities and quality of wheat, corn, and oats produced, the condition of the crops, &c., and all such facts which are published in the monthly bulletin. And, further, merely to give them power to inquire and report as to the number, condition, &c., of domestic animals is to allow in respect to live-stock what has been found very useful as to other agricultural products, and what ought to be allowed here. It involves only the same machinery which exists now, except so far as diseases are concerned.

I hope the pending section as amended may be allowed to pass and we may go on rapidly, stopping only at those sections to which gentlemen have a substantial amendment to offer in harmony with the general provisions of the bill. That is all I desire to say touching the first section and the amendments proposed to it. The second section has met with very little or no objection. The third can be considered when we come to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for debate on the first section and amendments thereto is exhausted. The Clerk will report the pending amendment, which is that offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS].

Insert after the word "purpose," in line 15, the following:
"With the consent of the Legislature of the State or States in which the persons so employed are to act."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 90, noes 101.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no other amendment pending. The Clerk will read the next section.

Mr. STEVENS. Would it be in order to offer a further amendment to the first section?

The CHAIRMAN. It would be in order to offer a further amendment, but not to debate it.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not wish to debate it.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the sixth line of section 1 and insert in lieu thereof as follows: "existence, cause, and extent of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases in cattle, horses, sheep, and swine (especially pleuro-pneumonia in cattle), and the means for the prevention and cure of same, and also to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country; and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose, not exceeding ten persons. The salary of the chief of said bureau shall be $3,000 per annum, and the said Commissioner is authorized to appoint a clerk for said bureau, with a salary of $1,500 per annum."

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 66, noes 104.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for tellers.

On the question of ordering tellers there were ayes 40—more than one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were ordered; and Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, and Mr. STEVENS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 84.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint two competent agents, who shall be practical stock-raisers or experienced business men, familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live-stock, whose duty it shall be, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia and to provide against the spread of other contagious diseases. The compensation of said agents shall be at the rate of $10 per diem, with all necessary expenses, while engaged in the actual performance of their duties under this act.

The Committee on Agriculture recommend that the section be amended by inserting in line 10, after the word "contagious," the words "infectious and communicable;" so that it will read:

To provide against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to amend this section by striking out the word "two," in the second line, and inserting the word "thirty-eight" before the words "competent agents." I do that for the purpose of providing an agent in every State in this Union who will be interested in determining the great and vital questions involved in this bill.

So far as I am personally concerned I am opposed to intrusting the determination of the cattle interests of this country to the Commissioner of Agriculture and the two agents whom he may sua sponte, or on his own motion, appoint. If we are to consider the great cattle interest, I mean not only the cattle interest but the sheep interest and the hog interest of this country, we should have a council composed of an agent from each State where cattle and sheep and hogs are found, and not allow this vast power to be exercised by persons here at Washington under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture. I have said that much in behalf of the amendment I have offered.

I want to say one word further. The gentleman from Missouri who has this bill in charge [Mr. HATCH] generously declared that he would accept any amendment that would perfect the bill and protect the rights of the people. I want to vote for this bill, but I have given a semi-opposition to it on the ground that it places $2,000,000,000 worth of property under the control of the Commissioner of Agriculture and the two agents whom he may appoint.

Now I ask the gentlemen who framed this bill where those two agents are going to operate? Are they going to spread all over the enormous proportions of this Republic or are they going to sit here in Washington and use their telescopes to observe the cattle diseases in this great land? I say that while I will go to the utmost limit to protect the cattle interests of this country, while I will go to the utmost limit to protect the sheep and the hog interests of this country, I will never consent that a bill formulated like this shall pass this House if I can possibly prevent its passage. It needs to be reformulated and remodeled, so that the men who own cattle, the men who own sheep, the men who own hogs shall act conjointly with the representatives of the National Government in determining whether or not those animals are diseased.

And I say in addition to that that it is of the highest importance—I had occasion the other day to use the phrase "supereminent importance," and my dear, logical, classical, kindly hearted friend from New York, now in the chair [Mr. COX], emphasized that phrase in the colloquy he had with me—I say it is a question of supereminent importance that we pass some bill touching this subject. The Democratic party can not afford to ignore or disregard its necessity; the Republican party can not have failed to see its necessity. [Here the hammer fell.] Just a moment. Will somebody give me another minute. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON and Mr. WELLER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] to speak next.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire again——

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. The inquiry I desire to propound is this: I supposed that I had conformed to the rules of this House in respectfully approaching the chairman and having my name placed second on the list. I understood that I was to be recognized after the distinguished gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] had made his remarks. I would like to know if that is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the rules require pro and con discussion. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLER. I think I want to take the con side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman soon on the pro side of the discussion.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WELLER. I now rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. While the fortunes that govern the destinies of many men have placed me on this side of the House, I declare to you that I really belong over on the other side [laughter] so far as this bill and its terms against the interests of the farmers and stock-raisers are concerned.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to repeat what I have already said to the friends of this bill, that I sincerely wish to get this bill into as good shape as possible, and to have a bill passed that will secure the object desired. For that reason I desire now to call the attention of the friends of the bill to the objections to this second section, and to ask them if they intend to pass it or desire to pass it in the shape it now is in.

A gentleman speaking a short time ago said that this second section, with the agents therein referred to, was simply for the purpose of the extermination of diseases among cattle. I wish to say to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that he has brought in a bill here with one section giving the power to the veterinary surgeon to pass upon the question of the existence of all these diseases and another section conferring identically the same powers on two additional agents.

Mr. KASSON. They have no power except a general power to inquire and recommend.

Mr. GIBSON. They have the same power as the veterinary surgeon, the power to inquire and recommend.

Mr. KASSON. That is all the power they have.

Mr. GIBSON. Exactly. Now, why should two sets of officers be invested with this power of inquiring and recommending?

But there is something else in this section of the bill which gentlemen do not seem to understand; it is buried down in it like a grain of wheat in a bushel of chaff. I refer to the provision that these two commercial agents shall have the power to adopt rules regulating the transportation of all the stock or cattle in this land and that they shall be men practically engaged in stock-raising. What would be the result of this? Why, sir, one of these agents may be a stock-broker in Chicago, another may be a stock-broker in New York. These two men—stock-brokers—men engaged in buying and speculating in cattle, will have the power to adopt or recommend rules by which the whole traffic in cattle in this country shall be regulated. When they have brought on enough cattle for their own business purposes, when they think the market is about to fall, they may stop all the cattle upon the railroad trains going into those cities. These cattle must then stand upon the tracks, to be fed at the expense of the owners, until these agents have realized their profits.

Now, I do not think this provision has anything to do with the prevention or cure of diseases among cattle; and it is not fair or honest, when gentlemen are assuming to legislate for preventing the spread of cattle diseases, to adopt a clause which may prevent the transportation of healthy and sound cattle. I wish now to give notice that after gentlemen who favor this bill shall have perfected this section as best they can by amendments, it is my purpose to move at a proper time to strike out this clause, because, with the solitary exception to which I have referred, the veterinary surgeon will have all the power proposed to be conferred upon these two agents.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to move the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. KASSON. There are two amendments pending.

Mr. WELLER. I offer this as a substitute for the second section.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 by striking out the word "two," in the second line, and in its place insert the word "one." Also, in same line, after the word "agent" add the following words: "In each State or Territory in the United States." Also, after the words "pleuro-pneumonia," in the ninth line, add the words "and other communicable diseases of live-stock." Also, in line 9, same section, after the words "pleuro-pneumonia," add the words "and other communicable diseases of live-stock." Also, at the end of line 9, strike out the word "other" and insert in its place the word "such;" so that the same, if so amended, will read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint one competent agent in each State and Territory, who shall be nominated thereto by the governor of the State or Territory in which such person is designated to act, who shall be practical stock-raisers or experienced business men, familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live-stock, whose duty it shall be, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases. The compensation of said agents shall be at the rate of reasonable dollars per diem, with all the necessary expenses, while engaged in the actual performance of their duties under this act."

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, I have had, from the very first, grave suspicions as to the intent of section 2 as it came from the hands of the Committee on Agriculture, and as I have analyzed and reflected upon the provisions of the section my conviction that it was in the interest of a stock ring has been confirmed to such an extent that I am now most seriously opposed to the section without the amendments I have suggested.

I find that in the second line this section provides for the appointment of "two competent agents" by the Commissioner of Agriculture. This is one of the things I object to. I do not want to have two men, selected by the Commissioner of Agriculture, to hold in his or their hands the entire cattle interest of the United States. It seems to me that if the Commissioner should be so unfortunate as to make a selection of vicious persons, persons disposed to do harm to the animal industries of the country, great injury might result under the operation of this section. I believe that each State and Territory, by its executive authority, should be permitted to designate to the Commissioner of Agriculture the name of a proper person who should be selected by the Commissioner as the agent of that State or Territory to do this work. I am satisfied that if an agent were selected by the executive of the State of Iowa, such agent would see to it that no stock ring in Chicago or any of the large cities east or west would be permitted to trespass upon the interests of the people to the extent that would be possible if two vicious men should be selected by the Commissioner of Agriculture or any one else under the section as it comes from the hands of the committee.

I desire to call special attention to another feature of this section. Lines 8 and 9 contain this language:

And the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases.

Now, I called attention not long since to the fact that there was not a single provision in the bill for the protection of those engaged in the sheep industry or in hog-raising or in the raising of horses, mules, &c. Not a single provision. We find it is for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia, and not for the suppression and extirpation of hog-cholera, sheep-scab, or the like.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I think all that is necessary to say in reply to the criticisms of the gentleman from West Virginia on the second section of the bill is to read that section in the hearing of the House. It is as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint two competent agents, who shall be practical stock-raisers or experienced business men, familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live-stock, whose duty it shall be, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases. The compensation of said agents shall be at the rate of $10 per diem, with all necessary expenses, while engaged in the actual performance of their duties under this act.

Mr. GIBSON. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. Does not the first section of the bill say that the chief of the bureau of animal industry shall investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among them, and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Unquestionably, and the object of the second section is to give the men engaged in cattle industry throughout the country proper representation in this bureau. Every single resolution and request made on the part of those representing that interest coming before our committee have been that the cattle-men should be fairly represented. The bill, as it has been framed and is now before the committee, provides for the apppointment of two practical stock-raisers, whose duty it shall be to examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. BELFORD. The bill is limited to two; why not put an agent in for each State and Territory?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Simply because the duties devolved on those two agents can be as well performed by them as by two hundred, and there is therefore not the least necessity for multiplying officials under this bill. Those two agents who are familiar with the question will make their examinations and report to the Commissioner from time to time.

Mr. BELFORD. Cattle-men do not appoint these two men, but it is done by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Of course.

Mr. WELLER. Before the gentleman sits down I would like to inquire of him whether the owners of hogs, asses, and sheep under section 2, if the bill shall become a law, would be compelled to quarantine their own stock for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. There is no suggestion of quarantine in the second section or anything like it. I ask unanimous consent of the committee that debate on the second section be limited to five minutes.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Say one minute.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I object.

Mr. BELFORD'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. WELLER'S amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. GIBSON. I move to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Mr. Chairman, the title of this bill provides for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals. The first section declares the manner in which the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize that bureau in his department. The pending amendment is that of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON], to strike out the second section, and I shall support that motion, because I can see no relation whatever between the subject-matter of that section and the object sought to be accomplished as stated in the caption of the bill. The first section of the bill provides for the collection of information by the establishment of this bureau. It also provides for the appointment of a competent veterinary surgeon as chief, who shall investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among them and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country.

The second section provides for the appointment of two agents, who shall be practical stock-raisers or experienced business men, familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live-stock. But when you come to inquire into the duties they are to be called upon to perform, these qualifications which are required do not fit them for the performance of those duties.

Now, one feature of this section is:

To examine and report upon the best methods * * * to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases.

Have not you already provided for it in the first section of the bill by the appointment of a competent professional man, capable of inquiring into the causes of such diseases, and also capable of recommending the best means of preventing their spread or of caring for animals so infected? But, Mr. Chairman, there is another feature of this section to which I call your attention:

To examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, &c.

What do these gentlemen know or propose to know of the best methods of treating or caring for animals? Is the treating, the caring for, and transporting animals in any way connected or has it anything to do with the establishment of a bureau of animal industry? I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that section seems to have been put in there as the gentleman from Missouri suggested, to give these industries a representation upon the bill so that they may draw $3,000 a year, and to be permitted to recommend their own and favorite modes of transporting cattle, no matter what their interest may be in such means of transportation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia, to strike out the second section.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to read the third section.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. At the suggestion of a large number of gentlemen around me I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. COBB having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 3967) to establish a bureau of animal industry, &c., had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MULLER, for the remainder of the week, on account of important business.

To Mr. ROWELL, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. DIBRELL, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House papers relative to the claim of Robert Mincey, late of Company B, Fifth Tennessee Volunteers; no adverse report.

The motion of Mr. HATCH was then agreed to on a division, there being—ayes 106, noes 35; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 27, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced his signature of the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 58) filling an existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, which had heretofore been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 186) for the relief of Frank Galt was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. 5262) to establish post-routes was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. Both Houses having passed a general post-route bill, if there be no objection the Chair will direct that this bill be not printed, as it is very voluminous, at this present time.

Mr. COCKRELL. It would be utterly useless to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred, without printing, if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of W. J. Hunter and others, of Chebanse, Ill., praying Congress to send, free of charge, to the Jaquitt Post, No. 293, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Illinois, of which they are members, a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented the petition of Sarah F. Kinzey, of Osceola, Mo., praying for an increase to $12 per month of all pensions granted to widows and dependent relatives of ex-Union soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a communication from the Woman's Christian Association of the District of Columbia, relating to that charity. As it is very brief I ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD, and I also ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The paper was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, officers of the Woman's Christian Association of the District of Columbia, beg leave herewith to submit our fourteenth annual report, and respectfully state that the institution under our charge has enjoyed for the year past its accustomed and gratifying prosperity.

In submitting our report we beg to call attention to our charter, by-laws, the order of business laid out and accomplished by the board of managers. By that industry and economy which we are obliged to practice we have been enabled to extend our work and afford relief to some whom heretofore we have been unable to reach. The establishing of the "woman's exchange" has excited an interest in many of the most active of our young ladies who are connected with the various churches of our city, and this promises to be of great value in affording suitable employment to many poor people, as well as a market where they can dispose of many articles manufactured by themselves at remunerative prices.

The Foster Home commends itself to all who visit the institution. The care, health, and discipline of those little ones placed here is worthy of all praise.

We submit also the report of the treasurer, showing the receipts from various other sources besides the Government appropriations, and the disbursements of the year past.

We close by asking for the same appropriation that has been given us for several past years, and for our increased and more extended work we shall rely upon the exertions of the good and charitable people who have before aided us and whose interest in our work steadily increases.

All of which is respectfully submitted; and, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

R. H. STRONG, President.
MARTHA S. POMEROY, Vice-President.
JANET M. THOMPSON, Vice-President
CHARLOTTE A. WEED, Secretary.
JOSEPHINE M. CHESTER, Treasurer.
L. J. CHICKERING,
S. A. JEWELL,
E. DELANO AMES,
Board of Managers.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February, 1884,

Mr. HARRISON. I present resolutions adopted at a meeting of the McHolland Post, No. 102, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, and indorsed by David K. Stopher Post, No. 75, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, in regard to certain relief measures now pending before Congress in regard to pension and bounty. The resolutions are not exactly in the form required by the rule, but as they evidently indicate that they should be presented to the Senate, I ask that they may be received and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolutions will be received and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GARLAND presented a petition of the principal chiefs in the delegation of the Cherokee Nation, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the Grand River from the Arkansas River to Fort Gibson, Ind. T.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Martha W. Bell, a resident of the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio, praying to be reimbursed for commissary supplies furnished to and receipted for by an authorized officer of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of T. W. D. Worthen and other citizens of Hanover, N. H., praying that an appropriation be made for education in Alaska: which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MAXEY. I present a paper in the nature of a petition, addressed to me by a committee of the Merchants and Wool-Growers' Association of Nueces County, Texas, praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the Aransas Pass, in that State. I will state that I know the gentlemen who have signed it, and they represent a highly respectable association, and their petition is worthy of consideration. The paper is so clearly designed to be laid before the Senate, that I ask that it be received and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be received and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of 2,000 citizens of the city of New York, praying for a repeal of the act and acts supplementary thereto by which the term of many administrative offices were changed and fixed at four years; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a petition of citizens of Harper and vicinity, Kansas, praying that an appropriation be made for education in Alaska. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BLAIR. The petition should go to the Committee on Appropriations, I suggest. A very large number of similar petitions have gone that way.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, suggests that the petition should go to the Committee on Appropriations. I have no choice myself about it, and am willing to accept his suggestion, although I know of no reason why it should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLAIR. That matter is before the Committee on Appropriations, and a large number of such memorials have already been referred to it. I myself see no reason why it should go there, and the whole matter is to be based on a sense of propriety in the first instance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from New Hampshire to move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the following petitions, praying for the repeal of the limitation of the four years applied to the tenure of certain administrative offices; which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment:

Mr. BLAIR. If it is not asking too much indulgence I should like that bill to be read at length, as it pertains to a matter immediately under consideration by the committee, and I should like them to have the bill earlier than it can be printed regularly.

Mr. BLAIR. That is sufficient.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

CROW INDIAN RESERVATION IN MONTANA.

Mr. VEST. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate if any lease or leases of any part of the Crow Idian reservation in Montana have been made to any person, partnership, or association of persons; and, if so, the extent of said lease or leases, to whom made, for what length of time, and upon what terms, and under what authority of law such action has been had by his Department.

That he also inform the Senate whether any permit has been given to any person, partnership, or association of persons to graze cattle upon said reservation; and, if so, the name of such person, partnership, or association, and by what authority of law such permit was given.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. Of course the matter is very interesting, but I saw within a day or two a document which led me to infer that that information had been furnished. I am not quite sure.

Mr. INGALLS. That related to the Indian Territory leases.

Mr. HAWLEY. I know that it related to the Indian Territory. Is the Senator quite sure that we have not already precisely that information?

Mr. VEST. For the Indian Territory. This relates to the Crow Indian reservation in Montana.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understood the resolution to apply to the Indian Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONSOLIDATION OF TELEGRAPH COMPANIES.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask for the present consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be directed to inquire whether at any time the Western Union and Baltimore and Ohio Telegraph Companies, or any officers or employés of said companies, have entered into contract or negotiation for the purpose of consolidating said companies or making combination for any purpose.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words by way of explanation. Some days ago I offered the same resolution, confining the time of negotiation within one year. The evidence of Dr. Green before the committee yesterday clearly establishes the fact that a contract was made and executed, but was two years ago instead of one. He says the elder Garrett defeated the operation of the contract. We desire to know why? It was generally understood when the elder Garrett had a clearer vision showing that the Western Union had secured the greater advantage his company repudiated, although the contract had been executed. That it was neither patriotism nor philanthropy or horror at consolidation or stock-watering that paralyzed for a moment the elder Garrett.

This inquiry is important now when the younger Garrett has been interviewing the committee and seriously proposing to assume the fatherly care of the Government toward the people and protect them by building new lines, that he will play the rôle of "big brother" against the extortions of Western Union. We have reason to "fear the Greeks 'though bearing gifts."

The Western Union have no sorrow or tears at the proposed building by the Baltimore and Ohio. They know, as does the elder Garrett, that new lines by individuals mean millions more of fictitious stock to be divided by the Western Union and Baltimore and Ohio, but it means also greater burdens and larger dividends to be taken from the people.

The proposition for the Government to build is the only thing that strikes terror to the Western Union. They come here with threats and entreaties; no supplications to the Baltimore and Ohio. Each of these corporations is playing the rôle assigned.

The Baltimore and Ohio, breathing war and threatenings against Western Union, even going through the appearance of a lawsuit, and the elder Garrett armed cap-a-pie, with lance in hand, a perfect knight-errant to avenge the wrongs of an oppressed people, and Dr. Green, with knitted brow and eyes flashing indignation, deny the power of Congress, that created them, to examine their papers and contracts, and arrogantly insist that Congress, having created the Western Union with unlimited capacity to create unlimited millions, have now no power left to protect the people or build other lines. Hence it becomes necessary now to have this second resolution directing the committee to inquire if those companies have made a contract of that kind at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GARLAND. There should be a clause in the resolution instructing the committee to report. It is merely directed to make the inquiry, and I suppose the Senator would like to have a report also.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Yes, sir; that will accompany the report which they will make on the whole subject.

Mr. GARLAND. It would be better to direct the committee to make a report on this special case.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Very well.

Mr. MORGAN. Before voting on the resolution I should like to be informed as to the jurisdiction that Congress possesses over contracts between these two companies. I am not aware that either of the companies derives any right or privilege from Congress. I believe they are both private companies; at least their charters are from the States, and they are conducting their business, like other corporations, in their own way. If I could see some purpose that was to be accomplished by this inquiry I should very cheerfully vote for the resolution to compel the information to be given, but I really do not understand what we are to do with the information after we get it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I presume that the Senator from Alabama is conversant with the history of the manner in which this whole investigation now comes before the American Congress. It has been proposed not only here but throughout the nation that the Government shall take under its charge the building or to a certain extent the control of telegraphs known as postal telegraphing; and in order to ascertain as to the necessities of the people and as to the propriety of the Government entering upon that enterprise this whole matter has been sent by the Senate to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to investigate it. In that connection an investigation has already been had and some witnesses have been examined by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and among them have been some representatives of the Baltimore and Ohio Telegraph Company, and the object of their coming was to show that there was no necessity for Congress to undertake to construct or control a postal telegraph line, because the Baltimore and Ohio Telegraph Company intended to do that thing themselves; that they are operating an independent line, and that fact was heralded here and throughout the country with the view of preventing action by Congress. It was said that inasmuch as the Baltimore and Ohio Company were assuming this independent attitude toward the Western Union Company, they would see to it that the people were guaranteed another independent line and cheap telegraphing without any fear of pooling or combining, as the Western Union has been doing, and buying up other lines.

Then it became necessary to know the animus of the Baltimore and Ohio Company, whether they meant what they said to the committee. It was stated before the committee and it was known to many persons that the Baltimore and Ohio had lately been in negotiations with the Western Union; that the Western Union had stretched forth its arms to embrace the Baltimore and Ohio, or else the Baltimore and Ohio was willing to enter and be embraced by the Western Union, as other pretended rival telegraph lines had been. In order that the committee and Congress and the nation may know how far they are to be protected by the Baltimore and Ohio, and therefore pass over this session of Congress without doing anything to give relief to the people in that direction, it became important to know the fact whether the Baltimore and Ohio had not been negotiating already in an attempt to "pool their issues" and to sell all their interest to the Western Union, the same as the Atlantic and Pacific and other lines had done. The best indication of that was the fact that Mr. Bates—I think that is the name of the man who generally goes gunning for the Western Union, the trusted man of the Western Union—went off into the Atlantic and Pacific some few years ago, you will remember. He separated his allegiance from the Western Union, but in a little while he had the Atlantic and Pacific bagged and ready for game to be carried back to the Western Union, and with that came a large increase of watered stock. Mr. Bates is promoted in the Western Union when he comes back with this game.

A little while after Mr. Bates, the trusted confidential officer of the Western Union, is sent on another expedition, and then it is to the Mutual Union, and by and bye, in due time, he comes back with his game-bag well stocked again, and he has the Mutual Union under his belt and a watered stock of $15,000,000 to be divided among the owners of the Mutual Union and the Western Union. The first thing we shall be told in regard to this matter by and bye will be that this same Mr. Bates has gone off to take an important position in the Baltimore and Ohio Telegraph Company, and if they are not checked it will be with the same results precisely; Mr. Bates will come back again with his game-bag full, and that time it will be the Baltimore and Ohio, and with millions more to be divided with the Western Union, our creature that we have made and to which we have given this power to make millions. They will incorporate with the Baltimore and Ohio, whose representative comes here and tells a committee of the Senate that their earnest desire is to stop all this sort of swindling in the future.

Hence it is, I will say to my friend the Senator from Alabama, that it becomes necessary that the intent and meaning shall be shown, so as to know whether it is safe to place in the hands of the Baltimore and Ohio Telegraph Company the power which belongs to and which should be exercised by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. I have not the slightest objection to the resolution and will vote for its passage, although, after the remarkable information which the Senator from Nebraska has declared and added to the subject, it seems to me that it is a work of supererogation to make any further inquiry. And after we get it what does it all amount to? Suppose that the Baltimore and Ohio Company has negotiated to unite with the Western Union people; they may cut off all those negotiations, they may never be resumed, and the consolidation may never take effect. Suppose, on the other hand, they never have negotiated; they may negotiate in five minutes. We have no control over that; and all the information we get will simply be "leather and prunella."

It is entirely apart, I submit, from the question, a very vital one, as to whether the Government shall engage in this business or not. So far as I am concerned, and in the vote which I shall give at the proper time on that question, I do not expect to be enlightened at all by anything that may be added by the committee upon the relations between these two companies or any other companies. I do hope to be enlightened, as I have no doubt I shall be, upon the general relations of the Government to this service, the cost of it if carried on under a proper system, and so on; but the controversies, multifarious, ever existing and never to be ended, between rival corporations is something which is nothing to us, which adds nothing to that which we are bound to act upon as sensible men when the time comes, and is simply prolonging the play, as I fear, and preventing us from getting before us some substantive measure and doing something which will meet the case according as we are prepared to act upon it in a practical way.

So far as I am concerned I wish to have the committee report. I believe they are willing to report; I believe they are able to report; and I do not believe that the stringing of this thing out from week to week upon a proposition of this kind is likely to help us. I do not mean to say that the committee have not abundance to do. I think the committee has done a great deal in what it has done, and I am not sure that all it has done has not been of the greatest wisdom. I know that some things I have learned have been to my great edification. I expect to be edified by it. But if we introduce a resolution every week, or two a week, committing to them some inquiry into the private relations, into the possibilities, the probabilities, of what somebody may do at some time or other, we shall wear out all the remainder of this session and of the succeeding sessions upon this question without ever arriving at any conclusion whatever.

Mr. PLATT. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and upon that motion I will say a few words.

I had the honor to introduce a resolution a short time ago directing the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to make some inquiries with reference to ascertaining whether the cost of telegraphic messages had been increased to the people of this country by the contracts which had been made by the Western Union Company. My object was a desire that the Government shall assume in some way the telegraph as a means of transmitting intelligence throughout this country. I have no quarrel with the Western Union Telegraph Company; I have none with the Baltimore and Ohio Telegraph Company. I think Congress has nothing to do with the quarrels between companies. If they choose to consolidate I know of no power in Congress that can stop them; but I do think that any information which tends to throw light upon the question whether the people are paying more for the transmission of intelligence by telegraph than they ought to pay, and whether the Government should assume it in order that the burden of the people may be lightened, is the subject of legitimate inquiry. I do not see what benefit it can be to have the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads inquire whether two companies are about to make some further consolidation. I think it very certain that any further consolidations which may be made in this country, the effect of which shall be to make the people pay rates for telegraphic messages sufficient to pay dividends upon more watered stock, will hasten the day when this Government will see its duty in the necessity of providing cheap telegraphy for the people of the country. I hope the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado, the chairman of the committee, whether this resolution in any sense emanates from the committee or has its sanction.

Mr. HILL. It has not been submitted to the committee. I have not heard of the resolution until this morning.

Mr. INGALLS. The reason I inquire is because if the information in the press is correct the committee have been examining the parties in interest upon this very question. Mr. Green, the president of the Western Union, and Mr. Garrett, representing the Baltimore and Ohio Telegraph Company, have both been before the committee, have been fully interrogated, and the result of the inquiry has been published in the newspapers of the day as a part of the current intelligence which we read every morning. I have no disposition to deprive the country of any information that may be valuable to it, nor would I interfere with the action of any committee in inquiring into the relations between these corporations; but it is evident to me that the committee have the power already and have exercised it, have had these witnesses before them, and the result of the inquiry has been published, and I see no necessity of passing resolutions to confer authority that exists and invite an investigation that has been made.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I supposed I had made myself plain to the Senator from Kansas. Probably he did not understand the point to which I referred. A resolution was submitted some days ago directing the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to inquire whether any contract of that kind had been made within one year, and when the investigation was pursued it was pursued under the terms of that resolution. Therefore it was that these gentlemen stated that there had been no such contract within one year, and by way of explanation Dr. Green said the contract had been made two years ago, and it was beyond the terms of the resolution because not within the time limited. Therefore it seemed to be necessary that it should not be restricted as to time, and the resolution was offered in this shape this morning. I am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut that the resolution shall be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. That I think would be the proper place for it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I understand that there is no objection to the commitment of this resolution to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. VAN WYCK. No; I think that is right.

Mr. BAYARD. That is a very proper course for it to take. There are very grave questions connected with this resolution and with this whole matter, and there is a very large assumption of power by the Senate in treating the proposition of the Senator from Nebraska which it would be very well for the committee to examine before the Senate undertakes to act upon the suggestion of this compulsory power of the disclosure of the affairs of private corporations, or rather corporations, not under the control of the Government of the United States.

As the matter is to be committed, however, I have nothing further to say on that subject just now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DANVILLE (VA.) INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask leave, rather out of order, to submit a report at this time from the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. As it is very brief, I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks leave at this time to make a report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections instructed by the Senate to inquire among other things into events preceding and connected with the recent election at Danville, Va., beg leave to report:

That the committee in pursuing said inquiry summoned sundry witnesses to testify as to said alleged events, some sixteen of whom were in attendance but not examined when the Secretary of the Senate informed the committee that the contingent fund, from which alone the legal per diem and traveling expenses can be paid, is exhausted; that a bill appropriating money for such expenses passed the Senate and was sent to the House of Representatives on Thursday, February 21, instant, but has not yet been acted upon; that on this day, when formal vouchers for such expenses were presented to the Secretary of the Senate for payment, he refused payment on the ground that there was no money in his possession available for this purpose; that in consequence of the want of an appropriation to pay expenses your committee decline to summon other witnesses, and suspend the inquiry ordered by the Senate until such appropriation is made, when the committee will continue and speedily complete the investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be placed on file.

CRUISE OF THE CORWIN.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate a copy of the report of Capt. C. L. Hooper, United States Revenue Marine, upon the second cruise of the revenue steamer Corwin in the Arctic Ocean, and its accompanying documents and illustrations, in possession of his Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions that order is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the business on the Calendar under the eighth rule, being Order of Business No. 115, Senate bill 590, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. 590) amending clause 2 of section 2426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to persons in the naval service of the United States entitled to bounty land-warrants.

Mr. HALE. Is there any report in the case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no written report.

Mr. HALE. I did not catch the purport of the bill from the reading. I wish that the Senator reporting it would explain what it covers.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the bill be again read. I should like to hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey objects, and the bill goes over.

ERECTION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The bill (S. 217) to amend section 3734 of the Revised Statutes, and to provide for the erection of public buildings by contract with the lowest bidders, was announced as next in order.

The bill was read.

Mr. INGALLS. That bill is obviously too important to be considered during the morning hour under Rule VIII. It revolutionizes the whole subject of the construction of public buildings. I object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). Objection being made, the bill will go over.

Mr. VEST. If that bill is to go over on objection, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds instruct me to report certain amendments to the bill, and I should like to have the bill printed as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendments will be received and ordered to be printed with the bill.

Mr. VEST. I send up the bill as amended. I report it now with these amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be printed as proposed to be amended.

REPAYMENT OF LAND FEES.

The bill (S. 321) amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands," approved June 16, 1880, was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no report, the Secretary informs the Chair. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] reported the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the Senator from Oregon will explain how the bill changes the existing law.

Mr. DOLPH. In the act of June 16, 1880, the words which are now proposed to be inserted, "or personal representatives," after "heirs or assigns," were accidentally omitted. This bill is merely to correct a clerical omission in the former act, and authorizes in the case mentioned in the act that the fees and money which have been paid on a canceled entry of public lands shall be refunded, and authorizes the repayment to be made to personal representatives as well as heirs or assigns. That is all there is in the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. As the law now stands can the return be made only to the person making the entry?

Mr. DOLPH. That is as I understand it. The bill has come up suddenly. We can turn to the act. It is very short.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a very important subject and it ought to be fully elucidated.

Mr. DOLPH. I am unable to lay my hands at this moment upon the statute, and if one of the other bills reported by me is being considered—I see several reported by me are now coming up in order—I shall have the act hunted up and read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over temporarily.

TIMBER-CULTURE LAWS.

The bill (S. 425) to repeal the timber-culture laws was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no report. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] reported this bill.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, that they may prepare a report to submit to the Senate with the recommendation of the bill. It is a very important subject, and I am not prepared to act on the information I have in favor of a repeal of the law, which has been considered a very desirable one for the purpose of tree-planting on the bare, treeless plains of the West. I had supposed, on the other hand, that there were some imperfections in that law, and that with some amendments made to the law it might fulfill a very important part in securing the culture of tracts of timber and encouraging the growth of wood and timber on our great Western prairies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves to recommit the bill with instructions to the committee to make a report with the bill when returned.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, all the information which can be had in regard to this proposed legislation may be found in the reports of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the years 1882 and 1883. Anything that the Committee on Public Lands could say in regard to this measure, having reported favorably upon the bill, would be a mere reiteration of what has been better said by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I send up the report of the Commissioner for the year 1883 to the Secretary's desk with the request that there may be read for the information of the Senator from Michigan that portion of it referring to the repeal of the timber-culture act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the portion of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office referred to, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

REPEAL OF THE TIMBER-CULTURE LAW.

In my last annual report I called attention to the abuses flowing from the operations of this act. Continued experience has demonstrated that these abuses are inherent in the law and beyond the reach of administrative methods for their correction. Settlement on the land is not required. Even residence within the State or Territory in which the land is situated is not a condition to an entry. A mere entry of record holds the land for one year without the performance of any act of cultivation. The meager act of breaking five acres, which can be done at the close of the year as well as at the beginning, holds the land for the second year. Comparatively trivial acts hold it for a third year. During these periods relinquishments of the entries are sold to homestead or other settlers at such price as the land may command.

My information leads me to the conclusion that a majority of entries under the timber-culture act are made for speculative purposes and not for the cultivation of timber. Compliance with law in these cases is a mere pretense and does not result in the production of timber. On the contrary, as one entry in a section exhausts the timber-culture right in that section, it follows that every fraudulent entry prevents a bona fide one on any portion of the section within which the fraudulent entry is made. My information is that no trees are to be seen over vast regions of country where timber-culture entries have been most numerous.

Again, under the operation of the pre-emption, homestead, and timber-culture laws, any one person may enter one hundred and sixty acres in each class of entry, making a total of four hundred and eighty acres which may be taken by one person. The power to acquire that quantity of public land by single individuals, while so many of the citizens of the country are landless, is contrary to the general spirit of the public land laws, and, I think, not in consonance with approved public policy.

This objection would hold to the timber-culture act if the law was generally complied with in good faith or if its provisions requiring the planting and cultivation of timber were capable of enforcement. I am convinced that the public interests will be served by a total repeal of the law, and I recommend such repeal.

Mr. DOLPH. I am not authorized to say that the committee indorse all that the Commissioner of the General Land Office has said upon this subject in this report, but from the best information that could be obtained by the committee they came to the conclusion that the public benefits which had been derived from the timber-culture act had not been such as to justify the expectation of the friends of the act when it was passed or to accomplish the object which Congress had in passing the act. From the best information the committee could obtain, it appears that a great many entries under this law are fraudulent; in fact, that but little timber is planted and cultivated so as to attain any considerable growth; and the committee came to the conclusion that the public interests would be subserved by the repeal of the act.

That is all the committee could say in regard to the matter if a formal report should be made. I presume every Senator will exercise his privilege in addressing the Senate upon the subject, especially if he disagrees with the report of the committee. I see no good object to be accomplished by the recommitment of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, there is perhaps no one subject that is attracting attention in the different nations of the earth to-day so much as the question of the destruction of timber and timber lands, and the effect produced thereby upon the climate and the health and growth of a country. In some countries hundreds of thousands of pounds are expended from private and by public sources to reclaim dry, desert, waste lands, to tree plant hills and mountains which are unfit for other kinds of cultivation in the Old World. With but a very small share of attention given to the subject by legislators in this country, there was an effort made to encourage the planting of forest trees on the great prairies in our own country. It was believed that if there should be scattered through these prairies, as there are now in the older portions of the prairie land in Illinois, Iowa, and Southern Wisconsin, numerous tree-plantings, frequent groves that should affect the climate, the moisture, the question of rain, the preservation of moisture, it would be well worth the attention of this Government to give a few thousand acres of these arid and utterly useless lands in many places to make this experiment.

The gentleman who reports this wholesale sweeping away of the project has had read to us from the Commissioner of the General Land Office a statement that so far the results of the law have not been as beneficial as was anticipated. Why, sir, the growth of the forest extends through decades, through centuries. The destruction of our forests, where we had forests, and in other parts of the world the destruction of forests there, has been going on through the centuries; and as to the great wilderness places of the Old World, once fertile, once capable of supporting a vast population, it is said that their lack of fertility is owing to the fact that the trees have been stripped from the mountains and from the valleys, and the country left, as in Judea, a great barren waste, where once thousands and perhaps millions of people dwelt in comfort and in safety. What could be expected by this committee from a system which has but just commenced its operation, where perhaps only ten or fifteen or twenty tree-culture claims in a State or in a Territory have been planted?

Sir, my recollection is that when we were revising the rules I desired to have added to one of the committees here the subject of forestry, and the Senate thought it of such importance that on my motion forestry was added to the Committee on Agriculture, so that there should be one committee of the Senate on Agriculture and forestry. Why was not this proposition referred to that committee which by the recent decision of the Senate was to have charge of that subject? But I will not dwell upon it now. A committee might spend day after day in examining the subject and gathering together reports from all other civilized nations on the subject of tree planting and forestry and reclaiming waste lands, and furnish a report which would be of infinite value to the people of the United States, and yet with one broad hand the whole subject is swept out of existence by this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CONGER. I am glad it has expired. I have had an opportunity of saying what I wished. I hope the bill will be referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I hope this bill will pass. I represent one of the States that it was supposed would be specially benefited by the act when it was adopted. The western third of Kansas is a treeless region, without sufficient rain for continuous cultivation. It was hoped that by the inducement held out by the granting of land to lead to the planting of trees that perhaps great climatic results might be achieved and a region now partially sterile be reclaimed and made useful for the purposes of agriculture. That experiment has been sufficiently tried. The law so far as the plains of Kansas and Nebraska are concerned is an absolute failure and worse than that; where a single tree has been successfully grown 10,000 acres of land have been fraudulently taken from the public domain.

My judgment is that the practical operations of this law have been the most stupendous and gigantic fraud upon the public domain that modern times have witnessed. It has resulted simply in enabling speculators and men who had no intention whatever of planting trees to obtain possession of one hundred and sixty acres of ground, which they have held for an indefinite period of time and then disposed of to some subsequent speculator for his own advantage.

I speak, sir, as one having knowledge and information upon this subject. I have made the matter a study. It is a question that very materially affects a large proportion of the people whom I represent; and I am authorized to say in their name, I believe, from extensive observation, from travel through the regions that have been affected by the operations of the law for several years last past, that they have had enough of the operation of it so far as they are concerned, and desire that the law shall no longer encumber the statute-book.

I hope, reserving to those who have taken land under the provisions of this law all the rights that may have become vested, that the Senate will concur with the committee and with the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and repeal this law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. CONGER. Feeling that possibly——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has spoken once.

Mr. CONGER. I was not about to speak again on the bill. I was about to say that fearing possibly that the pungent remarks and experiences of the Senator from Kansas might mislead the Senate, I withdraw the motion and object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator withdraws his motion to recommit and objects to the further consideration of the bill, which carries it over.

REPAYMENT OF LAND FEES.

Mr. DOLPH. I have found the act that I had reference to, and now ask the Senate to go back to the bill which was passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill passed over temporarily will be resumed.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 321) amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase-money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands," approved June 16, 1880. It provides that after the words "heirs or assigns," at the end of the second section of the act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase-money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands," approved June 16, 1880, the words "personal representatives" shall be inserted; but nothing herein contained is to relate to, or interfere with, or in any wise affect any application for repayment made by "heirs or assigns" in any case, under the act of June 16, 1880, prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. DOLPH. Section 2 of the act of June 16, 1880, entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase-money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands," provides:

SEC. 2. In all cases where homestead or timber-culture or desert-land entries or other entries of public lands have heretofore or shall hereafter be canceled for conflict, or where, from any cause, the entry has been erroneously allowed and can not be confirmed, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be repaid to the person who made such entry, or to his heirs or assigns, the fees and commissions, amount of purchase-money, and excesses paid upon the same upon the surrender of the duplicate receipt and the execution of a proper relinquishment of all claims to said land whenever such entry shall have been duly canceled by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and in all cases where parties have paid double-minimum price for land which has afterward been found not to be within the limits of a railroad land grant, the excess of $1.25 per acre shall in like manner be repaid to the purchaser thereof or to his heirs or assigns.

The object of this bill is to amend the section by inserting after the words "heirs or assigns" the words "personal representatives," so that the administrator or executor of a deceased person may recover this amount, as well as the heirs and assigns.

As I said before, it is a mere clerical or accidental omission in the original act. There can certainly be no harm in the amendment proposed by this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE PUBLIC-LAND STRIP.

The bill (S. 551) to extend the laws of the United States over certain unorganized territory south of the State of Kansas was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, in line 9, after the word "the," to strike out "Secretary of the Interior is authorized to cause the;" in line 11, after the word "strip," to strike out "to" and insert "may;" and after the word "service," at the end of the bill, to add "the work to be done under the direction and supervision of the United States surveyor-general for Colorado;" so as to make the bill read:

That the laws of the United States are hereby extended over the unorganized territory south of the State of Kansas and Colorado, and between the Indian Territory and the Territory of New Mexico, known as the public-land strip; and that for the purpose of the execution of said laws said public-land strip is annexed to the judicial district of Kansas and to the southwestern land district in said State; and the subdivisional lines of townships in said public-land strip may be surveyed under current appropriations for the surveying service, the work to be done under the direction and supervision of the United States surveyor-general for Colorado.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to have a division of the question, so as to have the vote taken on the first amendment, leaving the last to be voted on separately.

Mr. CONGER. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report accompanying the bill, which will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. DOLPH January 29, 1884:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 551) to extend the laws of the United States over certain unorganized territory south of the State of Kansas, reports the following amendments to the bill:

First. Strike out the words "Secretary of the Interior is authorized to cause the," in the ninth and tenth lines printed bill.

Second. Insert the word "may" in place of the word "to," in the eleventh line.

Third. And add after the word "service," in the twelfth line, the words "the work to be done under the direction and supervision of the United States surveyor-general for Colorado;" so that the bill will read, after the word "State" in the ninth line, "and the subdivisional lines of townships in said public-land strip may be surveyed under current appropriations for the surveying service, the work to be done under the direction and supervision of the United States surveyor-general for Colorado."

Your committee reports back said bill as amended, and, when so amended, recommends its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to inquire whether this is a part of what has been known heretofore as the Indian Territory. This refers to strip between Kansas and Texas and New Mexico.

Mr. PLUMB. That is the strip. It has never been known as part of the Indian Territory, and has not been recognized as such.

Mr. CONGER. Not since Kansas began to claim it, I think.

Mr. PLUMB. Kansas has no claim on it; it is not within the limits of the State. There is no proposition to incorporate it, and if there were, I do not think the people of Kansas would care to have it. It is a strip of land about thirty miles wide by one hundred and fifty long, which is now under no jurisdiction for criminal or civil purposes, is absolutely without any law. The next place, the land within its limits can not be entered anywhere because it is not in any land district for that purpose or for any other purpose. It has been surveyed under previous legislation into townships. This is simply to subdivide it in order that it may be subject to entry.

Mr. CONGER. That does not quite answer my question. I want to know whether this is not a part of what has been always considered and put on the map as the Indian Territory, and so recognized in the laws and so considered in some way by treaties with the Indians.

Mr. DOLPH. I think I can answer the question of the Senator from Michigan in a moment. The public-land strip is a strip of unoccupied public land next to the Indian Territory, and bounded on the west by New Mexico and on the north by Kansas and Colorado.

Mr. COCKRELL. And on the south by the panhandle of Texas.

Mr. DOLPH. It is a part of the tract ceded to the United States by Texas in 1850. It is not a part of the Indian Territory; it is not a part of any Territory of the Union. It was said by the commission who codified the public-land laws under an act of Congress to have an area estimated at 10,800 square miles, equal to 6,912,000 acres; but if it is measured upon the official map which has been issued from the General Land Office, it would appear to contain only about half as many square miles and about half that number of acres, if I have correctly computed it.

There has hitherto been no legislation looking to the settlement of these lands or to their survey except the survey of township lines mentioned by the Senator from Kansas. This bill proposes to authorize certain surveys to be made under the supervision of the surveyor-general of Colorado, and to attach the strip to the southern land district of Kansas. The Commissioner of the General Land Office in his report for 1883 has something to say in regard to the public-land strip, which is very brief, and I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will send to the Chair what he desires to have read.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would ask the Senator from Oregon if the east line of this strip is the west line of the Indian Territory?

Mr. DOLPH. It is.

Mr. COCKRELL. It never has been part of the Indian Territory.

Mr. DOLPH. It never has been a part of any Territory, and can not be incorporated into any State of course without the consent of the State. It lies partly south of Kansas and partly south of Colorado. It would more appropriately go to the State of Texas, but the State of Texas has I presume land enough already. I have sent for the report to which I referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is not now at the desk, having been sent to the Reporter's room.

Mr. PLUMB. I will say that the reading of the bill will disclose the fact that there is no proposition to incorporate this strip in any State anywhere. There is no public-land office in the State of Texas, for the reason that there are no public lands there. The nearest land office is the land office in the southwestern part of the State of Kansas. It simply goes there, therefore, by reason of the convenience of the settlers who will need to go to some land office for the purpose of making entries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report mentioned by the Senator from Oregon being here will now be read if there be no objection.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, will the Senate direct that the paper be read that the Senator from Oregon desires to have read?

Mr. DOLPH. I think it will be more appropriate to read it at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the objection of the Senator from Michigan was misunderstood. He objects to the consideration of the bill, not to the reading.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the consideration of the bill, so that it may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair misunderstood the Senator from Michigan. The bill is objected to, and goes over.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1490) to complete a statue of the late Rear-Admiral Samuel Francis Du Pont, United States Navy; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ALBERT JEHLE.

The bill (S. 777) granting a pension to Albert Jehle was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Albert Jehle, late a sergeant in Company D, Twenty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MITCHELL January 29, 1884:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 777) granting a pension to Albert Jehle, have examined the same, and report:

That the claimant, Albert Jehle, enlisted June 13, 1861, and served until mustered out, July 23, 1864, as sergeant of Company D, Twenty-eighth Ohio Volunteers. He made application for a pension, No. 334001, December 3, 1879, alleging that he contracted rheumatism on the march from Beverly to Lewisburg, at Greenbrier Mountain, West Virginia, caused by wading the Greenbrier River and other streams several times, and other exposures, on or about December 9, 1863. This disease affected both legs and sometimes the whole body. The claim was rejected by the Pension Office "on the ground that the records of the War Department furnish no evidence of the existence of the alleged disability in the service, and that the claimant is unable to furnish the parol testimony of a commissioned officer, surgeon, or comrade to establish origin in the service, or evidence of treatment since discharge."

This rejection, it would appear from a careful examination of all the papers in the case, was made upon technical grounds, mainly the inability of the claimant to furnish record evidence as to origin of disability. The claimant, under oath, states, as an excuse, that he was never treated by any of the surgeons, and that owing to lapse of time he is advised the officers can not remember the facts.

John Jochem, George Hoeppel, John Haerle, and Peter Roseman swear that they were neighbors of the claimant from 1859 to 1874, that they knew him prior to, at, and after his enlistment, and "that he was a sound, able-bodied man, and especially free from rheumatism in legs and body." The two latter testify they were comrades of the claimant in the same company and regiment.

"That since his discharge in 1864 to the present time he has been afflicted with rheumatism in legs and body; that said disease was contracted by exposure while in the service and in line of duty; and that they often saw him in bed, unable to help himself."

Herman Steinauer, a sergeant in the same company with claimant, swears that he marched with him in December, 1863, from Beverly to Lewisburg over the Greenbrier Mountains.

"That in the course of said march his company was compelled to wade through Greenbrier River and through creeks; that they were exposed to much rain and snow while on said march, and he remembers giving some medicine to his comrade, Albert Jehle, he complaining of rheumatic pain."

He also swears to his soundness before enlistment, and that he was "especially free from rheumatism at the time he enlisted and up to the time hereinbefore mentioned," and that he is of opinion that his said comrade, Jehle, contracted the disease of rheumatism through exposure to the elements while on the march aforesaid.

There is also considerable testimony showing existence of the disability at the time of discharge, its continuance, and its probably permanent character. The claimant swears that the two and only physicians who treated him at intervals from his discharge to 1878 are dead, therefore he can not produce medical testimony covering that period. Dr. Christian Fry treated the claimant in 1878 and since for rheumatism in legs and body, and thinks him incurable. The examining surgeon in 1881 rated him at $4 per month.

In addition to the evidence before the Commissioner of Pensions, an affidavit has been furnished your committee, made by eight neighbors of the claimant, certifying to his soundness before enlistment and disability ever since his return home after discharge. Also, the affidavit of Dr. Bucher, that his deceased father's books show the treatment of claimant for chronic rheumatism in 1869, and that claimant is now, and has been since he knew him, in feeble health. Also, the affidavit of claimant's employer, John Hartman, that during 1865 and 1866 claimant was frequently obliged to quit work, on which account he was compelled to discharge him; and that his sincere belief is that he is suffering with rheumatism contracted in the service. The statements of the postmaster and other reliable persons at claimant's residence corroborate these facts, and nothing appears to discredit any portion of this testimony.

Your committee think that the evidence presented satisfactorily shows this claimant to be entitled to a pension, and therefore report back this bill, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OATHS OF OFFICE.

The bill (H. R. 3926) to repeal the act of July 2, 1862, and such sections of the Revised Statutes as perpetuate the oath prescribed in said act, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1218. No person who held a commission in the Army or Navy of the United States at the beginning of the late rebellion, and afterward served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army or Navy of the United States."

SEC. 2. That section 1756 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and hereafter the oath to be taken by any person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit either in the civil, military, or naval service, except the President of the United States, shall be as prescribed in section 1757 of the Revised Statutes. But this repeal shall not affect the oaths prescribed by existing statutes in relation to the performance of duties in special or particular subordinate offices and employments.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of this act shall in no manner affect any right, duty, claim, obligation, or penalty now existing or already incurred; and all and every such right, duty, claim, obligation, and penalty shall be heard, tried, and determined, and effect shall be given thereto, in the same manner as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 4. That section 820 of the Revised Statutes, imposing certain disqualifications on grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States, and section 821 of the Revised Statutes, prescribing an oath for grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. CONGER. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no written report.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no written report.

Mr. CONGER. What is repealed by these sections? Will some gentleman state?

Mr. LOGAN. The amendment refers specifically to the sections that are repealed. The Senator will observe that the bill which passed the House was not agreed to by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate on examining it, for the reason that it was regarded as repealing everything and allowing all claims, no matter of what character, to be presented without the prescribed oath required in the statutes. It wiped out everything of that kind, or at least that was my construction of it. The committee have amended the bill so as to repeal the section requiring grand and petit jurors to be excluded from serving on a jury where they aided or assisted in the rebellion. That portion of the law is repealed. It also repeals the oath required to be taken by officers, so that, for instance, all members of Congress and Senators shall take the same oath to support the Constitution of the United States instead of what is commonly known as the test-oath. It provides further that no person shall be appointed in the Army or Navy who held a commission in the Army or Navy prior to the rebellion and afterward held any position under the Confederate States, either in the army, navy, or civil service.

These are the provisions of the bill as amended; to that extent it goes and no further, reserving all the rights that are reserved in the statutes of the United States to individuals and to the Government against persons making claims against the Government of the United States who are now prohibited by law. It leaves them precisely in the condition they are at present, and affects nothing except the oaths pertaining to officers and jurors and appointments in the Army and the Navy.

Mr. CONGER. It has no effect, then, upon any oath required to be taken by persons who present claims as to whether they were loyal or not to the Union?

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. It leaves that as it is. It affects only the oaths of officers and jurors, and retains the provision that no person shall be appointed in the Army or Navy who held a commission at the time of the commencement of the rebellion and afterward served in any capacity in the Confederate States, in its military, naval, or civil service. That is the bill as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GARLAND. I will state to the Senator from Michigan that this is precisely the same bill that was reported in 1882 by the Judiciary Committee unanimously, and the matter to which he called the attention of the Senator from Illinois is specially excepted in the bill. All subaltern officers have to be sworn in the different Departments, the Post-Office, Treasury, &c., to discharge their duties properly. The test-oath as to jurors was repealed many years ago, but in making up the revision it found its way back into the statutes, and in the case of Hammond vs. The United States, reported in 2 Woods, Judge Woods decided that the revision re-enacted the statute notwithstanding it had been repealed. That is the way it now stands, because it found its way back in the revision though it had been repealed; and many of the courts, notwithstanding that decision, have declined to administer the oath to jurors, as in the State of Arkansas.

The Supreme Court in the case of The United States vs. Gale, from Florida, decided in October, 1883, to be reported in the one hundred and eighth volume of United States Reports, alluded to this difficulty which Judge Woods had met in the Hammond case, and said that it was probable the fact of the repeal was overlooked by Congress when the revision was adopted, and expressed the hope that the attention of Congress would be called to it.

The remainder of the amended bill is simply to put the oaths in sections 1756 and 1757 on an equality, to make the Senator from Michigan and myself, for example, swear to support the Constitution, no more and no less, leaving the constiutional oath in regard to the President as it is.

That is all there is in the bill as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill amending the Revised Statutes of the United States in respect of official oaths, and for other purposes."

RAILROAD IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The bill (S. 50) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The bill was read.

Mr. HARRISON. I think I shall object to the consideration of that bill now. It is too important to be disposed of under this rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill being objected to goes over.

Mr. COKE. I would ask the Senator from Indiana not to interpose objection here. This is a bill of great importance directly to half a dozen States and indirectly to the commerce of the whole country. It has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Railroads; it has received the informal assent of the Committee on Indian Affairs; it is an exceedingly liberal bill to the interests of the Indians, while one absolutely necessary to the interests of the section of country where the road is to be built.

I ask the Senator, in consideration of the fact that two committees have assented to this bill, and that it is on the line of a bill passed two years ago by Congress giving the right of way through the same Territory, governed by the same principles, not to interpose an objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I should be glad to respond as a matter of courtesy to the request of my brother Senator. This bill, I have no doubt, he has properly characterized as a very important one. It was because I had that view of it that I objected to the attempt to consider it under the five-minute rule. I think it has too much scope altogether, both as it looks toward the rights of the Indians through whose Territory this road is to run and the rate of compensation that is to be paid, to enable us to give anything like proper consideration to it under the five-minute rule. Therefore I made the objection. The bill will be reached soon on the Calendar in its order, and undoubtedly then it can be considered deliberately and properly.

I do not understand, I may say to the Senator, as I am a member of the Indian Committee, that this bill has received the sanction of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I am a member of that committee, and I do not know that this bill has been submitted to it.

Mr. COKE. If it was in order to state what occurred in committee——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that all this debate goes on by general consent. An objection being made, of course that ends the consideration of the bill. If the objection be withdrawn the bill and its amendments must be read through before it is open to debate.

Mr. COKE. I simply ask permission to state with reference to what I said about the assent of the Committee on Indian Affairs that it was informally presented to that committee. It was not referred to that committee, but it was informally presented at a meeting of the committee when there was a business quorum present, and the committee did assent to it.

Mr. HARRISON. At the suggestion of the Senator, if he can get unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over retaining its present place on the Calendar, I will let it take that shape. I find that no copy of the bill can be procured. I sent to the document-room for a copy of this bill No. 50, and none can be had now. I am willing it should take that course, if the Senator so desires.

Mr. DAWES. I ought to say in reference to what was said by the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order, but by general consent the Chair will recognize the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. COKE. I ask unanimous consent that this bill take the place suggested by the Senator from Indiana on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana withdraw his objection?

Mr. HARRISON. I am willing to withdraw the objection if the bill may be passed over retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII until some of us can look into it. I find it impossible now to get a copy of the bill even, though I have sent to the document-room for one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn, and the Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that this bill may go over retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. It will be subject again to objection, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be subject again to objection.

Mr. BROWN. As we have sent to the document-room and can not get copies of the bill, I move that there be additional copies printed and laid on the table by to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that an order be entered for a reprint of the bill now under consideration. If there be no objection that order will be entered.

Mr. BROWN. There are copies of the original bill, but not of the substitute which has been reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair, if there be no objection, will treat this bill as being under consideration, so that it will stand at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII to-morrow morning. ["Agreed."]

The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

ADDITIONAL STEEL VESSELS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 698) to authorize the construction of additional steel vessels for the Navy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey is, in line 4, section 1, after the word "of," to strike out "seven" and insert "four;" and in lines 9, 10, and 11 to strike out "one cruiser of 4,500 tons displacement, one cruiser of 3,600 tons, one dispatch-vessel of 1,500 tons;" so as to read:

That the President is hereby authorized to direct the construction of four steel vessels for the Navy of the United States, as recommended in the report of the naval advisory board dated October 25, 1883, and in the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy of December 1, 1883, as follows: Two heavily armed gunboats of 1,500 tons each, and one light gunboat of 750 tons, and one gunboat, not to exceed 900 tons, to be built on plans and specifications to be furnished by the Admiral of the Navy and under his supervision and directions, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

And to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 3. That the gunboats, steel ram, and torpedo-boats authorized to be built under sections 1 and 2 of this act shall be built under complete plans and specifications to be furnished by the Navy Department, except the gunboat to be built on plans to be furnished by the Admiral of the Navy; and such building shall be under contracts with the lowest responsible bidder or bidders, made after at least sixty days' advertisement, published in five of the leading newspapers of the United States, inviting proposals for building said vessels, subject to all such rules, regulations, superintendence, and provisions as to bonds and security for the due completion of the work as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe; and no such vessel shall be accepted unless completed in strict conformity with the contract, and no contract shall be made until all the general plans, detailed or working drawings, and specifications for the complete work be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the first amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I have a great deal of respect for the opinions of my distinguished friend from New Jersey, as he very well knows, especially in regard to matters touching the interests of the Navy. Still, I can not concur with him in the view he entertains with respect to the present amendment, and for this reason: The bill before the Senate, as it clearly indicates, embodies the recommendation of the advisory board organized for the purpose of taking into consideration the wants of this important branch of the public service. That board, as we all know, is composed of some of the most skillful, efficient, and experienced officers in the public service, who have deliberated upon this subject under all the responsibility attaching to them as honorable men having at stake not only their own interests but the interests of the great service with which they are identified. The bill simply undertakes to give effect to the recommendations of that board that brought to the consideration of the subject special qualifications, which the Senator from New Jersey will pardon me for saying I do not think that he possesses any more than myself. I would not undertake, for instance, to put my opinion against the opinion of a board of admirals who had devoted their lives to the public service.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator bear with me a moment?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I entirely disclaim ever having placed my own opinion against the opinion of the board that the Senator eulogizes so highly. I did cite the opinion of officers more distinguished than they as a reason why we should not build any more of these vessels at present.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Only one officer.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I cited the testimony of Mr. Wilson, the present Chief Naval Constructor; of Mr. Shock, the present Chief Engineer of the Navy, and of Mr. Isherwood, a distinguished engineer.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Those opinions all relate to mere details; but I shall speak in respect to the substantial wants of the Navy, whether we should have four or seven cruisers. I would be willing to provide for the construction of ten, if I could, but I can not go beyond the recommendations of the committee and the provisions of this bill. The question before the Senate is not a party one. It involves the honor, the safety, and interests of a great nation—one of the foremost on earth, certainly one which to-day exemplifies to the world more than any other the capacity of man to govern himself.

I have no hesitation in saying to the Senate and to the country that the condition of the United States to-day as one of the great powers of the earth, the only popular government on earth that the people of the world have any faith in, so far as the naval arm of its service is concerned, is a public disgrace. I know that it is often said that we do not need any armed force. That is all very well with respect to our Army, and I fully concur with those gentlemen who are in favor of keeping down the military force on shore to the smallest number; but I do say that with respect to our naval force it is important to the interests, to the honor of this great country, that it should have such a force as that Russia, that England, or any of the great powers of the Continent will respect it. I do not say that we need the great fleets of England and France, because they have a continental system to maintain which we have not. But when you come to scrutinize the condition of the public force of this continent, when you come to look at the naval power of Brazil, of Spain, of the little weak, insignificant nations that surround you here, and see what they could bring to bear against you in a moment of emergency, it places the condition of this country where it ought not to be. Look at Brazil, look at Spain whose territory to-day is almost within sight of our own shores; and the Senate will remember that in 1873, when we were in this weak condition that I speak of, by one of those sudden emergencies which are always liable to occur we were carried almost to the brink of war, the Government was called upon to spend millions of money to prepare for enforcing its rights, when if we had had a navy no such emergency would have taken place. Would it not have been wiser to have spent the money in putting the Navy on a proper footing before that emergency than afterwards?

I do think if there is one thing which the public mind of this country is settled upon more than another it is that the United States ought to have a respectable naval force, and I make the assertion here to-day that there is not one ship in commission under this Republic that will compare with one of the best vessels of Brazil. The republics south of us on this continent have just as little to apprehend from European aggression as we have, and still the weakest of them have better ships than can be found in our Navy. Here is the great Republic of North America, whose moral power I admit is very great; but what do the nations of the earth care about your moral power after you leave your own shores? How are you going to impress yourselves upon the thoughts of those people on the other hemisphere with whom you are brought in contact and with whom the interests of your people are identified? They do not study your history; they do not read your laws; they do not care anything about your moral power. All that they do respect when the emergency arises is a decent display of public force. That was indicated as early as the time of Mr. Jefferson, when this Republic was in its infancy, and when he was forced to send a few miserable sloops of war to Tripoli to put out of existence some piratical depredators who were depredating on the rights of American commerce at that early day. If it was important at that early day to have a naval force to vindicate our rights abroad, how much more important is it now to be in a position to defend the rights of our citizens in every part of the globe. But what was done in Jefferson's time was in keeping with the spirit of the day. No great war vessels were necessary then, and none were employed. Still it was necessary to maintain the honor and the dignity of the country, and it was done.

Where are we to-day? Not one ship, I repeat, in commission to-day under this Republic that will compare with the best vessel in the service of Brazil. We know very well that if it came to a contest of military power Brazil would certainly not be able to cope with us; but that is not the trouble. Who can tell the moment that you may be involved in complications like those of Peru? These contests must be naval. There is no power on earth to-day that is going to invade the United States; and looking to the possibility of complications with foreign nations you have only to guard against naval attacks. Great Britain, although she has territory on our northern frontier, would not attempt a land campaign against this country; Germany would not undertake it; no power on earth to-day would attempt a military enterprise against the United States. The smallest reflection will satisfy anybody that all we have to do to protect the honor and the interests of this great country, so far as foreign nations are concerned, is to put our naval force on a decent and respectable footing. We do not need a great standing army; everybody knows that; but no man can tell the moment that this nation will be involved in complications with those powers of the earth that have at their command immense fleets through whose instrumentality they might for a time bring defeat to our flag.

I say here to-day that if, by any want of attention to this subject or neglect of public men, dishonor were brought on this country in a sudden emergency by the precipitation of a foreign fleet upon our shores, the American people would never forgive it. And what right have we to suppose that we can enjoy perpetual exemption from what is the ordinary fate of nations? The other day Germany sent back the resolution of the other House and treated your power with disdain. Do you think she would have treated a resolution of the English commons in that way?

There are some things that are even more important than mere dollars and cents. Sentiment and the sense of public honor go much further. I have heard it said that you can provide torpedo-boats and other defenses to make up for the want of a navy. I deny that. It is not a pleasant thing to be compelled to say, but I am forced to say to-day that this great country, with its interests and its honor, is exposed to the weakest power on earth in case of trouble. It seems to me that something ought to be done, not in view of war, not by way of preparation for hostilities against anybody, but to show the powers of the earth that in case of emergency we are prepared to defend ourselves and our people abroad.

There is another view of this subject that is not often thought of. This continent and this Republic, as everybody knows, has become the place of refuge, you may say, for the oppressed people of the world. Let anybody reflect what this Republic would be to-day if the masses of the oppressed people of the earth had not taken refuge here under the inspiration of human liberty. We have now fifty-odd millions of people. If our original three millions with which we combated Great Britain had been left to natural increase I suppose we would have had ten millions to-day; but under the inspiration of the great idea of liberty the people from every land have sought refuge, protection, and the means of life beneath the flag of this great Republic. In that respect it occupies an exceptional position to any other nation of the world. There is no nation on the face of the earth to-day that has received accessions of population from other countries like the United States. They are here, the Germans, the Irish, the English, from every land, constituting a power which is very great. They leave behind them their old traditions, and they come here inspired with a love of freedom. I think the experience of the past will justify me in saying that their attachment for the country and its institutions has been intensified in proportion to the length of time they have lived here. Separating themselves from old despotisms, forming new conceptions of life and of freedom, and becoming part of this Republic, these people and their rights give rise to a condition of things that no other country in the world has had to deal with. Hence the relation of the United States to the nations of the earth is very important and close and delicate, and some of the most angry questions that we have had to combat in times gone by have arisen out of this system of self-expatriation on the part of millions of men who sought refuge upon this continent. Nothing has done more to increase the prestige, power, and wealth of England than the spirit she has always displayed in protecting her subjects abroad.

When it comes to the defense of our frontier at home against Indians or against any power that is near we can always improvise an army. We can at any time put in the field a military force that will overwhelm any power in the world that might undertake to invade our soil. But suppose you come into complication with one of the great powers of the earth (and you are just as likely to-day to do it as any nation in the world), how are you going to meet it? Your soil will not be invaded. Somebody said the other day that we did not have any commerce. We have enough of commerce to bring insult, and contumely, and degradation to the American name. It is not necessary that we should have the ocean covered with a mercantile marine in order to suffer insult. It might be effected in the case of one ship or of one man as readily as of a fleet; and I say we ought to be in a position, above any power at least on this continent, to maintain the interests, the rights, and the honor of our people in every part of the globe and on any occasion likely to arise. In case of trouble with a first-rate naval power a half a dozen of armored ships could put an end to the whole commerce of the Gulf of Mexico. The loss of this trade for six months would exceed the sum asked for in this bill.

I confess very candidly that when in Europe last summer and speaking upon this grave subject with thoughtful men I became ashamed of the American Navy—not of the personnel of the Navy, because in all great emergencies it has proved itself equal to them. They told me there they had read about this great country, its vast population and its immense wealth, but said: "We do not see anything of it over here. Every now and then one of your old hulks drifts into our harbors floating your flag, and figures very indifferently beside the ships of the most indifferent powers of the earth." The great heart of the people of the world is with this Republic, and the masses everywhere wish for its success. It ought not to be at a disadvantage anywhere in connection with other powers. I say the United States ought not to be in that position.

While I quite concur in everything that has been said by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] in regard to the extravagance characterizing the expenditure of public money in the past, that does not meet the present question. I say the men and the party who have dealt in a profligate way with the public funds ought to be held to rigid accountability, but that is not an argument against providing for the national defense at the present moment.

I concurred, as the Senator from New Jersey well knows, in everything that he said last session in regard to the provision of law that looked to the destruction of the wooden ships of our navy, and everything that he said here yesterday was only a fulfillment of the prophecy that I then pointed out. But I was voted down and he was voted down by friends on both sides of the Chamber on that proposition.

But that does not meet the question. I agree fully with all that the Senator has said on that subject. I never would have given to any man the power that was given by that amendment, which I stood here day by day by the side of the Senator to resist. I thought it was a most unwise thing to do to say that the wooden ships of our Navy, all that we had, should be retired in the way proposed. Admitting all that and concurring in everything that the Senator has said upon that subject, I go further than he is willing to go and favor the appropriation of public money to supply the existing want of the naval arm of the public service. I think now that it would be a wise thing for Congress to repeal that law. I think that we have some ships in the Navy that ought to be kept there, notwithstanding the heavy bills of repairs that have come in from time to time. It will take a long time to build up a navy that will conform to the wants of the present time and the grand changes in naval architecture, and in the mean time we want to keep our best wooden ships afloat.

Mr. BECK. The rate of repair now is 20 per cent.?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It is 20 per cent. I said in my place in the Senate when that proposition was pending that it was an unwise thing to do. The underwriters' rule was one-third new for old. Thirty-three and one-third per cent. was the rule that was applicable to private interests, but the Senate and House adopted the rule of 20 per cent., and said that when repairs on one of our best ships would require 20 per cent. of the value of a similar vessel it should be retired from the Navy. I do not think that wise.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, as we may have to act upon this question further, I wish to call his attention to this provision in a bill on my desk reported to the House of Representatives February 8, 1884:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs, to be appraised by a competent board of naval officers, shall exceed 30 per cent. of the estimated cost, appraised in like manner, of a new ship of the same size and like material.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Last year it was fixed by Congress at 20 per cent.

Mr. BECK. This is the new naval appropriation bill which has been reported to the House. How far would that improve it? That is what I wanted to ask the Senator from Florida.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It would not improve it at all. I did not see and I do not now see any necessity for touching the old law on this subject. We went from the beginning of the Government to last Congress without any law on the subject. I will say to the friends of a new navy in that candid spirit in which I am in the habit of addressing myself to all questions of this kind, that they made a great blunder when they brought forth the proposition to retire the existing ships in the Navy with a view of substituting them with a class of vessels that would conform to the wants of the present time and the class of ships in Europe.

Mr. BECK. When are the cruisers now being constructed to be finished? Is there any time fixed?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. In December. I for one am willing to maintain the existing status of the Navy as regards the old vessels. Let them be repaired when in the judgment of the chief of the Navy they ought to be repaired. I would go on and provide for a new navy, but I say that when the sweeping proposition was brought forth giving authority to the Navy Department for the first time to destroy every wooden ship in the Navy under the amendment which I resisted two years in succession on this floor but ineffectually, it was not a wise thing to do. But that belongs to the past, and I do not bring any feeling into this discussion that will prevent me now from going as far as any man can go in providing means to create a navy suitable to the wants of this great country. I think we have some ships in the Navy that can perform very important service. War, after all, is the exceptional condition of mankind fortunately, and peace is the rule. There are a great many things that those vessels can do in time of peace. Some of them are first-class ships of their kind, and I see no necessity for blotting them out of existence as it is intended to do. We know very well from the past that it was with those vessels that all the important victories in the late unhappy civil war were accomplished. The fame of Farragut and every naval commander whose name is dear to the American heart was won by that description of vessels. He passed forts, he rode over torpedoes, he performed everything that was possible to be performed in naval warfare with these wooden hulks that it has become so fashionable to decry and to denounce.

I say again to the friends of a new navy that it is not necessary to do this thing in order to build up a navy suitable to this great country. Let the old ships remain; let the power of repair remain where it was from the beginning of the Government. Repeal the 20 per cent. provision in your law which gives to the Secretary of the Navy an authority which he never had before, and go on and provide for new ships, and I will vote for them every time I have an opportunity.

I want the confidence of the country, and I do not want any suspicion hanging over this business. I want the people to feel that this is a bona fide and an honest effort, without regard to party, to build up the Navy. I have been met on every hand with the objection that it will not do to do this thing now. I say this is the time to do it. It does not matter to me what party is in power, whether it is a Republican or a Democratic President; any man who enters on that high office, or any party who has control of the destinies of this great country, will be bound at all times to defend its interests and its honor against every foe. I am aware that there has been great mal-administration in the past respecting the Navy. But I don't think it is possible at this time for any man to go far away from the law that Congress may enact on this subject. It won't do to let the public interest suffer because you have a suspicion that the persons in power will not do their duty. Such a principle would end in the suppression of all government.

The bill proposes to give to the President of the United States authority to build a few additional ships, suited to the exigencies of the times. The construction of these vessels will call for the insignificant appropriation of about $4,000,000. Sir, one ship such as Great Britain has recently built would cost the whole of this sum; and if I had my way I would build that kind of a ship. I think the last vessel that Great Britain put afloat, in order to keep up with her great antagonist on the other side of the channel, cost nearly $3,500,000. She has been adding to that class of ships every year; so that if to-day unfortunately any trouble should spring up between Great Britain and this country, our whole coast would be at her mercy. I do not need to say this in order that it may be felt on the other side of the water, because they know it better there than we do here. Even Spain has twenty-one armored vessels. We have nothing to compete with her. Weak as she is on the continent, with possessions almost within sight of our own shores and complications likely to spring up at any moment between us, we have nothing to meet even that power with in the event of a naval emergency.

I will say in addition to this that while the wise framers of the Constitution thought proper to guard against the establishment of a great military force, their jealousy never was excited for a moment with respect to the Navy. In looking at your organic law you will find that Congress, by the terms of the Constitution, is prohibited from making an appropriation for the support of a military force for a longer period than two years, while with respect to the Navy there has been no limitation whatever put over the power of Congress on that subject. This was not mere accident. The men who framed that organic law were well aware of the reason for that distinction. They knew that the history of the world did not afford an instance where the liberty of any people was stricken down by a naval force. On the contrary, they were well aware that in nearly every instance where human liberty was prostrated and human rights crushed it was through the instrumentality of a standing army. Hence they took wise precaution to guard against the perpetuation of a military force, and they would not permit the representatives of the people even to provide an appropriation of public money for the continuation of a military force that might be employed for the destruction of their freedom for a period longer than two years. When you come to the subject of the Navy the Constitution is silent. It breathes the language of trust and confidence and security, because those men knew that no navy had ever been employed to crush public liberty anywhere. Therefore I am glad, Mr. President, that in voting in the line of the building up of the Navy I can do so consistently with that regard for the liberties of this great country which lie so close to my heart.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the first amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. BROWN. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the first amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4 of section 1, after the words "construction of," it is proposed to strike out "seven" and insert "four;" so as to read:

That the President is hereby authorized to direct the construction of four steel vessels for the Navy of the United States, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to this amendment. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I simply wish to say before the vote is taken that under this amendment it is only proposed to suspend for the time being the duplication of the cruisers now under construction, which will be finished in December under the contract, until we test them as to their efficiency.

Mr. HALE. The effect of this amendment, should it be adopted, would be to stay the building up of the Navy any further for at least a year to come, so far as the larger kinds of vessels are concerned. The vessels that the Senator from New Jersey seeks to strike out are precisely the vessels that the naval advisory board lays its main stress upon. They are the vessels approved by old, experienced, and tried naval officers, including the Admiral of the Navy. They are the only vessels that throughout the waters of the globe would be able anywhere to compete with the armed cruisers of Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, Spain, or any of the naval powers of the world. Strike out these and let the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey be adopted, and the bill is shorn of its main strength, and the American Senate on deliberation is put in the attitude of hanging up all of this valuable work for a year to come.

So confident am I that the Senate is not ready to assume that attitude that I do not propose to take any more time of the body. The time may come, and no man knows when, when every Senator who has in any way contributed to the delay in saving this country from its defenseless position may well regret that attitude. I hope the Senate will now adhere, and put an end to this amendment, which shears the bill of its strength.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the country been attacked? Is there any immediate peril? Are we going to be involved in a war with any foreign country? Have we any cause for it?

Mr. HALE. It is very easy to ask those questions. The country has been going on for nineteen years in that easy-go-lucky way that I fancy suits the Senator from Missouri. I do not predict any war. I hope there will be none. I said yesterday, however (and the more I reflect upon it the more strongly I am impressed with the danger), that I do not believe it will be possible during the next twenty years for the United States to keep out of complication and contact, and it may be conflict, with foreign nations, as it has for the last twenty years.

The Senate must take its attitude. It must be seen by the country who is in favor of building up a respectable naval establishment, not to invite war, but to avert it. The very thing which the Senator from Missouri plumes himself as a citizen upon, that we are at peace, is what we should seek to secure hereafter; and a respectable naval power on the waters of the globe is the best insurance against war of anything that we can have.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I expect to vote for the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, and I do not intend to be characterized before the country without a denial of the charge as opposing the building of ships for the Navy in a proper manner. I believe we ought to have a respectable, not a great navy; our present Navy is, I admit, a contemptible one; but I am not satisfied with the methods employed to increase it. After hearing the speech of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] on yesterday I am not satisfied that the four ships we are now building will prove to be satisfactory after they are built. We shall know by next December whether they will be or not; it will be time enough then to determine whether or not we ought to duplicate them, as this bill proposes. We ought not to do so if they prove to be failures; to that I suppose all will agree. While this naval board have recommended them, the Senator from New Jersey laid before us yesterday the testimony of the Chief Engineer of the Navy Department, I believe it was, and of Mr. Isherwood and others, assuming that the ships we are now building will not be the kind of ships we need. Surely we ought to have that question settled by at least seeing these ships afloat before we proceed to construct seven others, at least four of them on the same plan. We have made blunders enough with the Puritan and other ironclads already.

We took a decided step last year when we gave the Secretary authority to build four ships—the Chicago, the Boston, the Atlanta, and the Dolphin. They are, as I understand it, to be finished in December. All agree that there is no immediate urgent necessity for the building of a great navy, and if there was, we could not compete with any of the great powers of the world at any time for some years to come upon the high seas, because, as I observe from the table furnished yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], England has to-day 61 armored ships, France has 58, Germany 27. Stating it in brief, England has 1,861 guns, France 1,541, and so on. England has 75,000 sailors and France has 73,000. We have 8,000 sailors, no armored ships, and no guns of any account. If the experiment we are now making proves not to be a successful one we ought not to continue or perpetuate the blunders of the last Congress, but ought to make appropriations for new contracts in such a form as to surely give us ships that are efficient for war purposes.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to ask him a question in that connection?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I remember very distinctly what has been said about the question of testing the capacity of those ships. I do not know what means would be resorted to to test their efficiency except actual war. We know that the powers of Europe have gone on in advance of all war experiment, and constructed upon human judgment a number of vessels which have proved to be successful. It was said that England was going to fail, and that there was no real test of her ironclads until the bombardment of Alexandria, but the event there showed that they came up to everything that human judgment indicated before. That is all we can do.

Mr. BECK. We are experimenting in regard to four ships now. They are being built; they are to be finished next December. Whether their machinery or their guns or their capacity to compete with the ships of other nations is such as we intended can be tested, I assume, without actual war. We might knock down, to test them, some of those old barracks about the Pensacola navy-yard, where everybody dies who goes to them, and save the country some money by the experiment, and make a good test of the ships and their capacity besides; and so in many other places. There is no trouble about making tests to show that the ships are good or to prove that they are worthless for fighting purposes. Until that is done it seems to me that we can afford to wait, without its being charged that we are seeking to keep down or break down the American Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator if he has any plan or suggestion to make by which ships can be built?

Mr. BECK. I have this to say about that, as I propose to look at some other considerations a little——

Mr. BUTLER. I should like very much to have some suggestion which is better than this, if there is one. I will go as far as any Senator on this floor with the Senator from Kentucky if he makes a suggestion better than this one.

Mr. BECK. I do not like the method, as I am at present advised, under which we are now building ships and proposing to start more new ones. Perhaps before next December we shall ascertain some better way. We have a law now on the statute-books that authorizes the Government of the United States if it build ships to bring in guns, machinery, indeed anything it needs or wants, free of duty to this country; and yet the Secretary of the Navy is required or authorized to make contracts to build all our ships at over 45 per cent. in advance of the open market price of all materials needed to construct or arm a ship of war, and is from the necessity of the case compelled to contract with a single man, as there is no real competition. I do not like that.

Mr. BUTLER. Upon that subject I have no opinion whatever. I am informed that the advertisement was made for bidders upon these ships, and that Mr. Roach got the contract because he underbid everybody else.

Mr. BECK. But the bid was limited to people who had yards of a certain character and certain plants. There were but one or two who have them, owing to the almost absolute destruction of our mercantile marine, the building of ships for which could alone enable great shipyards to be maintained.

Mr. BUTLER. I must assume that the advisory board, composed of naval officers and experts, would not commit a fraud upon the Government by giving the contract improperly to Mr. Roach. I assume that.

Mr. BECK. I am not charging that.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. Let me answer the Senator from South Carolina just for a moment, and then I will yield. As I have been asked the question about fraudulent contracts let me say a word. I object to the proposition to start a number of more new ships now, and since the Senator desires me to do so I will tell him why very frankly. I am not charging either the Secretary, the board, or the contractor with committing a fraud; but is it not a fact that the Government of the United States has placed upon its statute-books a law reserving to itself the right to use any material of any sort from any part of the world free of duty? Is it not also true that we have six or seven navy-yards now in the United States where all that material thus obtained duty free can be used? And is it not true that we have made contracts with a single man for the four cruisers we have now put upon the stocks at an advance over what the things can be bought for in the markets of the world of at least 45 per cent. above the open market price?

Mr. BUTLER. Upon that point I should like to give the Senator a little information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. I presume the Senator is referring to the manufacture of steel guns.

Mr. BECK. Not specially. I refer to everything that goes to make a ship.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator says we should go into the navy-yards of the United States Government and build the ships, and make the ordnance and make the equipment complete.

Mr. BECK. No, I do not say that.

Mr. BUTLER. I have a statement from an officer of the Navy connected with the Ordnance Bureau from which it appears that the weight of hammers used for making steel forgings suitable for making high-power modern steel cannon is in England eighty tons; in Russia, eighty to ninety tons; in France, one hundred tons; and in Germany, eighty tons. The largest hammer in the United States is fifteen tons, which does not strike a sufficiently heavy blow to act throughout the large steel forgings required for guns above six-inch caliber. The governments that I have mentioned have hammers from fifty to one hundred tons; the United States has one of fifteen tons. Now, I should like to ask the Senator how we are to make those improved cannon unless we have all the appliances to do it?

Mr. BECK. Are all those appliances now in the private ship-yards in the United States?

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all.

Mr. BECK. How do you propose to make guns?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not understand that there is a hammer of over fifteen tons in the United States.

Mr. BECK. Then how are you going to get guns?

Mr. BUTLER. By giving the Ordnance Department authority to get all the appliances necessary to make the best guns.

Mr. BECK. Does this bill propose to take any step in that direction?

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all.

Mr. BECK. What has that got to do with this question?

Mr. BUTLER. I simply made that statement in reply to a remark of the Senator's that we should go into the navy-yards and make these ships ourselves.

Mr. BECK. I suppose we can buy as big hammers as anybody has got anywhere, if we need them.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, if we appropriate the money to do it.

Mr. BECK. The largest hammer in the world is for sale, I presume, no matter where it is, and if we need it it can be had. But here is the difficulty: I said I objected to the method proposed, to contract for these ships, and that I wanted to look into it, coming back to that. I remember that last year we had a tariff commission which made a provision in the bill they recommended that never was heard of before in this country, which was obviously intended as a heavy tax on our armored ships or as a bounty to those who contracted to build them—that "armor or other plate, iron or steel, or combination of iron and steel, finished or unfinished, not less than 1½ inches thick," should pay a duty of "2½ cents per pound." Another provision that the now celebrated tariff commission sought to impose upon us was "steel in any form, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 3 cents per pound," or nearly $70 a ton. I see in the testimony that the Senator from South Carolina so kindly furnished to us yesterday that when the Secretary of the Navy was called upon to state how it was that Mr. Roach underbid Mr. Cramp by $300,000, he said:

> I think Mr. Roach estimated on the price of steel at 5 cents a pound or less. I think that the Messrs. Cramp felt unwilling to estimate on less than about 7 or 8 cents a pound.
> Senator BUTLER. Those tests had never been accurately made.
> Secretary CHANDLER. Never in this country had any steel been manufactured in large quantities subjected to such rigid tests. Of course to produce steel with exactly those qualities requires a careful chemical admixture in preparing the charges for the furnace and in handling the material; and while it had been done for a few plates of steel, it never had been done with thousands of tons before. Here was the element of uncertainty. It has been very happily surmounted, and it now appears that the steel manufacturers can make an admixture that will give steel possessing those qualities, and make it with certainty and celerity, and it is a great triumph for our manufacturers that they have been able to do it.
> Mr. STEERS. The advisory board has brought down steel from 8½ to 4½ cents a pound. Those who refused to furnish the steel, who were unsuccessful bidders, at 7 cents a pound would be very glad now to make it for 4½. Mr. Roach when he gave the contract for steel for these ships only gave it partially, and he has some yet to be given out. The steel-makers will be very glad to take it at 4½ cents a pound, and it ought to be less than that.

I think I now understand why the tariff commission imposed a specific duty of 3 cents a pound on steel and 2½ cents a pound upon armor for our ships of war. The men who fixed up that job knew it would result in a bounty of from 65 to 80 per cent. to the fortunate or favored contractors for our ships of war, which of course is a heavy tax upon the people, and that all who opposed the bounty would be denounced as unpatriotic, if not enemies of their country, by allowing our seaboard cities to remain exposed to the attacks of foreign ironclads, notwithstanding the fact that we have the right to procure all ship material, machinery, and armament at the cheapest rate in the free, open markets of the world. Gentlemen here insist upon putting the building of the ships into the hands of men who bid upon the assumption that they have to pay 45 per cent. more than all the materials for the ships are worth in the open market of the world. It is urged, perhaps truly, that we can not build them in our own navy-yards. Why? For the reason shown by the Senator from South Carolina yesterday in Admiral Porter's testimony, that there is so much dishonesty there that we can not trust anybody. I was shocked and amazed when Admiral Porter said that he built a small vessel in a navy-yard which cost $460,000, and "she could have been built at an outside establishment for $200,000 without any trouble at all," the tariff tax of course included.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the Senator to say, in view of the statement made by Admiral Porter, that he would have these vessels built in the Government navy-yards?

Mr. BECK. I mean to say that I will postpone their construction until December if I can, and I hope the day is not far distant when the navy-yards will not be managed as Admiral Porter says they are managed now.

Mr. BUTLER. That is a different proposition.

Mr. BECK. The proposition is that I will not vote to put money into anybody's hands who will allow navy-yards to be run in that way.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the Senator, then, to say that the ground of his opposition is because he has not confidence in the present Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BECK. I do not say anything about the present Secretary of the Navy. I have no confidence in the management of navy-yards that are carried on as Admiral Porter says our navy-yards are. The Senator from South Carolina himself read what Admiral Porter said. I did not know that things were quite that bad. Let me read it again:

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator takes that ground, as it is perfectly proper that he should——

Mr. BECK. One moment. You furnished this proof yourself.

Mr. BUTLER. I will stand by it.

Mr. BECK. Admiral Porter said:

> She cost $460,000 built at a navy-yard, and she could have been built at an outside establishment for $200,000 without any trouble at all. I know this certainly, because they charged everything to that small vessel. They charged one item alone of $80,000, work put on the Trenton, and other things of the same kind. One item, I think, was a hot-house for some one in the navy-yard.

There was not a dollar of that $80,000 charged to the Trenton he admits. They called it an expenditure for repairs of the Trenton, but the account against the Trenton does not show that a dollar of that $80,000 was charged to her. It was all charged to the construction of the small $200,000 vessel, but $80,000 of the $460,000 put down as her cost was said to go to the Trenton, yet the account for repairs against the Trenton does not show that a dollar was so expended. It may have been put into the hands of Dorsey & Co. for the campaign in Indiana, perhaps it was, and called repairs of the Trenton. It may have been put into somebody else's hands, just as the hot-house was charged to this vessel; and I am asked now to vote to furnish seven or eight new vessels to be put upon the stocks with such proof as this before me.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish the Senator——

Mr. BECK. Let me go on; I want to finish this part of Admiral Porter's statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please address the Chair and allow the Chair to ascertain whether the Senator who is entitled to the floor consents to be interrupted.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg pardon of the Chair.

Mr. BECK. I wish to read further from the statement given us yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina. It reads thus:

> Senator BUTLER. That becomes a very important fact, it seems to me.
> Admiral PORTER. You can never ascertain what a ship costs in a navy-yard.
> Senator JONES. What do you attribute that difference in cost to?
> Admiral PORTER. Politics. That is about the fact of it. The navy-yards are very much used for political purposes, and very naturally. If I was a politician I suppose I would do the same thing. If I could get my friends into the navy-yards, I presume I should do as others do; but at the same time, if I was in charge of the yard I would do all I could to stop it. But what I say is the fact, and it causes a great deal of the expense.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. BECK. Certainly. The question I would like somebody to answer is, is that true or is it not true?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I presume it is true. What I wish to say to the Senator from Kentucky is just this: Admitting everything that he says to be true, is that a sufficient answer to the country that the public defense shall not be provided for?

Mr. BECK. The country is making no demand for an increase of the Navy so far as I know beyond what we have done. We have now four ships being built that are yet unfinished and yet untested, and if they are failures we will have to throw them away just as England had to do with her Armstrong guns after spending $12,000,000 for them.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to get the Senator back to his proposition. He was going away from it, and I want him to come to that.

Mr. BECK. I will try.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the Senator to take the ground that we ought not to give out these ships to be built by contract; that they ought to be constructed in the navy-yards of the country.

Mr. BECK. I have not said that yet. I am not wedded to the methods described by Admiral Porter.

Mr. BUTLER. That was the drift of the Senator's argument as I understood him, and that there was something crooked or wrong about the contract that had been made for the vessels provided for at the last session of Congress.

Mr. BECK. I have not said that either. I said it was a shame that the people of the United States should have to pay 45 per cent. tax upon everything entering into our ships of war more than the ship is worth in open market, when by law we have a right to have all ship material, machinery, and guns as cheaply as anybody else in the world. That is what I have stated.

Mr. BUTLER. When the Senator from Kentucky undertakes to mix up the tariff with the construction of naval vessels and says we ought to have the materials cheaper, I will go as far as any Senator on this floor to join him in that; but I submit to the Senator that that question has nothing whatever to do with the building of ships.

Mr. BECK. I insist that it has everything to do with it. A law of the United States provides that every article that the United States desires for its own use or needs for its own purposes shall pay no tariff tax whatever; that it shall be duty free, whether it is a Krupp gun, a Whitehead torpedo, a compound engine, or a rivet to nail on an iron plate; and yet, under a law of the United States which now provides that 45 per cent. duty shall be paid upon every article that is made of iron and steel, Mr. Roach or Mr. anybody else who bids for a United States ship has to add 45 per cent. to the cost beyond the foreign cost in making his bids to build the ships of the United States, the law of the United States that these things shall be free to the contrary notwithstanding, when if we had honest officials conducting our navy-yards we could build ships as cheaply as any other people. To show that we do pay the whole tariff tax, I hold in my hand——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Kentucky——

Mr. BECK. Let me go on for a moment.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will not interrupt you unless you consent.

Mr. BECK. You may interrupt me when I prove this point.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BECK, I want to prove that we are now paying the full amount of the 45 per cent. tax on manufactures of iron and steel. I hold the protest of the iron and steel manufacturers against the Morrison tariff bill in my hand, in which they say:

> The undersigned, representing producers of iron ores and manufacturers of iron and steel, submit this their protest against the enactment of the bill known as the Morrison tariff bill, now under the consideration of your committee, with our reasons for said protest.
> First, because of the effect that any reduction of duties must have on labor. The iron and steel business of the country to-day yields little or no profit on the capital invested. If the duties are reduced, the selling price of our products must be reduced to compete with the foreign importations.

That means that they are charging 45 per cent. now above the foreign price, and if we reduce it to 40 they must come down to 40 or they will be underbid. I think in view of their own statement I was justified in saying that we must make contracts for our ships, when we have a right to have everything free by law, and when everything is in fact free, at 45 per cent. above what they are worth in the markets of the world. I say further, and the Senators on the Naval Committee know it, that there is not another nation in the world that pursues such a policy. England to-day, with her sixty-one armored ships, uses the Krupp gun almost exclusively. Where is the Krupp gun made? In Germany.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is the point on which I wanted to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BECK. England uses the Whitehead torpedo, made in Austria; she uses cheap materials, cheap guns, cheap anything, where she can get them; yet we are passing laws confining our bids to manufacturers with certain plants in their navy-yards, in the face of the law, paying them 45 per cent. more, when by law we have the right to use all these taxed materials free of duty; and the tariff commission that sought to impose a tax of 2½ cents a pound on ship armor and 3 cents a pound specific duty on steel were working in perfect harmony with the combinations which seek to make the United States pay much more than the ships were worth or than they would cost us if we could trust our officials in our navy-yards with the free materials we have by law a right to use.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. On that point will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am in accord with the Senator, as he knows very well, on all tariff questions, but I want to know of him if he thinks that the public opinion of this country now or hereafter would ever submit to having proposals sent to England, or to France, or to any foreign country, respecting the furnishing of the materials entering into the construction of our Navy.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say to the Senator from Florida if the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, that we send now to England——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I asked the question of the Senator from Kentucky. I did not ask it of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BECK. Let the Senator from Alabama answer.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to make a statement that comes under my personal observation. We send to England for the ingots of steel that we work in the navy-yard at Washington to make into guns; we send to Germany for the breech-blocks and other breech arrangements of our steel guns. There is a gun in the navy-yard here that is made of English-made steel, hammered and drawn out there, and brought here. When the Government put it up they intended to have it balanced on its trunnions, and it weighed 1,100 pounds more at the breech of the gun than at the muzzle after our navy-yard had been at work on it about six months. We send there for nearly all the materials of steel out of which we make our guns.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The answer of the Senator from Alabama, though not called for by me, is not a response to my question.

Mr. BECK. I will answer the question as I understand it. The people of this country and the sentiment of this country will permit the Government of this country to get the best article, whether it is a gun or a ship or a steam-engine, wherever they can get it best and cheapest.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator to state a while ago that that was not the case, and that we paid 45 per cent. more in this country than we should be required to do; and yet the Senator from Alabama has just stated that a great many of those articles are imported from England.

Mr. BECK. Because the United States has a right to import them free, and because you give a contract to a man, to Mr. Roach or somebody else, who has no right to import them free, because he is a contractor for the ships and he bids upon the basis of a tariff tax of 45 per cent. on everything that he sells to you, while if we built the ships in our own navy-yards, as the Senator from Alabama said, the articles would all come in free.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is mistaken when he says I gave the contract to Mr. Roach.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon, the Naval Committee.

Mr. BUTLER. I had nothing to do with it more than the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. Congress gave it.

Mr. BUTLER. Congress did.

Mr. BECK. Congress or the Secretary of the Navy, no matter who; he has got it.

When I speak of taxation I have a right to refer to what we have done. I have shown what the tariff commission attempted to do. The Senate of the United States in the bill it passed last winter put down all steel not specially enumerated at 30 per cent. ad valorem and all manufactures of iron and steel at 35 per cent. ad valorem, but it got into the hands of a so-called conference committee, and they increased the tax on steel to 45 per cent. ad valorem, and all manufactured articles and wares of iron, steel, &c., not specially enumerated, most of which had been 35 per cent. before, to 45 per cent. ad valorem, without condescending to give a reason for it, against the expressed will of the Senate and against the known wishes and interests of this people. This of course adds vastly to the cost of public ships built in private yards. I took occasion this morning to turn back to the tariff act proposed in 1872, when there was a Republican majority in both House of perhaps two-thirds, when machinery was much less perfect than it is now, but the manufacturers did not then own or control the Government or Congress quite as absolutely as they do now; when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] reported a bill, No. 2042, in the House of Representatives, on the 16th of April, 1872, in which he only asks a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem on manufactures of iron. That was all anybody dared to ask. He gave in the margin of the bill the present law, showing that it was 35 per cent.; the act of 1857, showing that it was 24 per cent.; the act of 1846, showing that it was 30 per cent.; and the act of 1842, which had been called a high protective tariff, 30 per cent.; and yet when the Senate of the United States saw fit to make those things 35 per cent., keeping it up to the old law, the House having passed no bill, it was made 45 per cent. in that miserable pretense of a conference, and all the contracts for our ships are being made upon the basis of 45 per cent. ad valorem above open market prices.

That is one reason why I say I am not content to make new contracts until I see if something better can not be done. It will only require us to wait until December to see how the ships we provided for last year are constructed. I want to see if we can not, before we make contracts for new ships, at least have something like a decent reduction of taxation upon the materials and machinery upon which the new contracts can be based. I want to see if we can not reduce it down to 30 or 35 per cent., or some reasonable percentage, before we make new contracts for seven or eight more new ships upon a basis of 45 per cent., as we would have to do now, in addition to what by law we are entitled to if we could trust our own navy-yard officials.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the Senator to say that unless we can get that reduction he will have no new ships built.

Mr. BECK. I do not say that at all. I say that I shall vote against this bill at this time because I want to see what will be the outcome of those that are now being built, and I shall vote against it in the hope that we will not have such a condition of things in the navy-yards of the United States when we meet again a year from now as the Senator from South Carolina showed us by the testimony of Admiral Porter now exists. I repeat that if we have an honest administration of our navy-yards we can build our ships almost as cheaply as they can be built in England, because we have a right to go to Prussia for our guns, to Austria for our torpedoes, to England for our machinery; we have a right to go all over the world and bring everything in free of duty at the cheapest rate, and we have mechanics as well skilled as those of any other nation, and we pay our employés as liberally as any other people do; all we need to have our ships of the best quality furnished to us at the cheapest possible rate is honest administration, which, as shown by the testimony that the Senator from South Carolina read, we do not have now.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Kentucky that if that is possible to be done it would be a wise thing to do. I tried to get some information on this subject when on the Naval Committee that had this matter specially in charge, and I asked the gentlemen there how Great Britain managed this question. I understand that with all her great experience and her skilled labor and her honest administration, all her first-class naval ships are constructed by private contract.

Mr. BECK. I admit that, and I admit that all things being equal private enterprise will always work cheaper than administrative power. But England's private workshops get all their material precisely at the same price as she could get it in her navy-yards. There are no embarrassments, no tariff taxes, and no 45 per cent. difference between her navy-yards and the operations of men who are carrying on private yards there. Everything is as cheap in the private yards as in the public navy-yards of England. But under our law everything in our private navy-yards is 45 per cent. higher. Everything that constitutes a ship, or any part of it, under our law pays 45 per cent. tax in the hands of the owners of private navy-yards here. Senators can not fail to perceive the difference in that condition of things between us and England. If our materials were all free, all admitted alike to the United States and to private men, I have no doubt that a private man would work his hands more closely than the Government supervisors of the United States work their hands in the navy-yards; and all things being equal we would get cheaper ships and perhaps quite as good work.

Therefore, the illustration of English private navy-yards does not bear upon this question. I am not attacking any person; I am dealing with facts, not individuals. I repeat that the public history of the country shows that it is vice in administration, dishonesty in management. That is the trouble with all our public enterprises. I heard Mr. Schenck, of Ohio, then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in the very worst days of the old whisky frauds in 1868 say in his place in the House of Representatives that although at $2 a gallon we were only collecting fourteen or fifteen million dollars annual revenue, and when it was reduced to 50 cents a gallon we got $40,000,000, that it was stolen in nine cases out of ten with the direct connivance of the officers of the United States. I believe his language was that not less than 90 per cent. of the amount was so stolen. When we hear of undervaluations of imports the same conditions prevail. These things are impossible except by the direct connivance of the officers of the United States. When we hear of all this corruption in navy-yards it may be assumed without fear of contradiction that it is carried on with the direct connivance and consent if not by the direct authority and orders of United States officials. I do not propose to vote millions to be used as Admiral Porter said the money for the ship he spoke of was used. I am not in love with the present navy-yard system. It is, perhaps, worse than the favoritism and extravagance of the high-tariff contract system.

We have a navy-yard at Mare Island; California is considered a doubtful State politically. We have one at Pensacola, and Florida is not so one sided; we have one at Norfolk, in Virginia; we have one in New York, at Brooklyn; one in the Secretary's own State of New Hampshire; and there might be a good many Trentons repaired and charged to something else between now and the November election, with seven or eight millions of dollars, if things have not improved since Admiral Porter looked into them.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the Senator from Kentucky has put up a man of straw to knock him down.

Mr. BECK. I am not knocking anybody down. If I can keep from being knocked down by the Senater from South Carolina I shall be lucky.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to make a very pertinent suggestion to him. He says he does not desire to appropriate millions of dollars to be spent in the United States navy-yards. Nobody proposes that under this bill.

Mr. BECK. Nor do I propose to pay 45 per cent. more than a ship is worth to give a job to anybody, if I can help it.

Mr. BUTLER. That is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. BECK. The two run together.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no proposition whatever to build any of these ships in the Government navy-yards, as I understand. I concur with the Senator, and I sympathize with him very largely in the reasons why they should not be constructed in the Government navy-yards, and for one I prefer that advertisements should be made for bids all over the country, to be taken by the different private yards in the United States. That I understand to be the proposition of this bill.

Mr. BECK. I said I did not intend to vote for the bill, and I did not propose to be charged without a denial with being an enemy to the American Navy in doing so. My objection is as to the methods employed. I think, Mr. President, that I have been more sharply catechized than usual. I have managed, however, to say substantially what I desired, and for fear that I may keep up this controversy and prevent a vote on the bill, which I have no disposition to do, I will not say anything more.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words, and a few words only, in reply to the Senator from Kentucky. I tried to follow him in the course of his remarks, and the amount of his argument is that because of some shortcomings, some dishonesty, some delinquency on the part of some officers not named, to some amount not designated, some indefinite, undefined, it may be imaginary defalcation or shortcoming on the part of persons employed by the Government to carry out its trusts, we are to neglect our public obligation. That is what it amounts to; that the honor, that the interests of the American people are to be put aside because in the administration of the details of some little miserable office corruption may have crept in, as it has crept everywhere where Government has been known, and that we are to refuse to provide for an armed force to meet the necessities of the nation. Analyze and probe what he says, and what does it amount to? Some constructor, some little insignificant character who does not weigh a feather's weight in the estimation of the country, may have neglected his duty, may have spent more money in repairing ships than he ought to have done, may have defrauded the public and have become a public malefactor; and the Senator from Kentucky, with that breadth of statesmanship for which he is distinguished all over this land, comes before the American people and says, "I will because of this refuse to give my assent to any provision looking to the creation of a navy to defend the honor and the interests of the country!" That is his position.

Mr. BECK. I deny that——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will yield if the Senator wishes the floor.

Mr. BECK. No; I thought the Senator was taking his seat.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No. Then again, with respect to the construction of ships required by this Government, I say to him very candidly and in the best possible spirit that, tariff or no tariff, in all propositions looking to the construction of vessels to be employed and used by this Government, the people of this country will never submit to those proposals going beyond the Atlantic Ocean. I say this, grate where it may. I am with the Senator on the tariff, but I say that the public man or the Secretary of the Navy or the President of the United States who should undertake to send a bid across the Atlantic to any quarter of Europe to furnish materials for or to construct ships would meet with universal American condemnation.

Mr. BECK. When I rose at first it was to protest against the statement that I was opposing an American navy because I was not willing to vote for this bill. I said that we were building four ships now that were not tested yet and that might prove to be utterly worthless, and yet we were now required to duplicate them before we knew what they would do or whether they were worth building or not. I said furthermore that this very Naval Committee, who have seen fit to fling this bill before us and demand that we shall build seven ships before those now being constructed are tested, are lauding themselves as the special guardians of the honor of this great Republic. I say that until the ships now under way are tested any attempt to build more of the same kind in the navy-yards as at present managed, as proved by the Senator from South Carolina, or under contract with Mr. Roach or anybody else at 45 per cent. more than they are worth, when under an honest administration they could be built in the navy-yards 45 per cent. cheaper than the contract now proposed, comes from those who do not stand in an attitude before the American people to tell me or anybody else who does not see fit to go into their proposition to build seven more ships that we are leaving the country defenseless.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, this debate on the part of the advocates of this bill has assumed a somewhat remarkable phase as evidenced by what has been said by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES]. They claim that our seaboard is in a defenseless condition and that we are without a navy, and they have spoken of assaults on our national honor and of the results that would come to the seaboard cities of the United States before we could protect ourselves from the navies of maritime nations. Mr. President, there is no danger on the seaboard; there is no public necessity asking for the passage of any such bill. Because in the spirit, not of economy, but of prudence, Senators on this floor ask that the Senate should wait until the vessels now being constructed are finished and tested, we are taunted with not being alive to the national honor and the national faith. There is no public sentiment in this country such as the gentlemen have spoken of demanding the enormous outlay of money proposed to be appropriated for the purpose of building additional war vessels. The public sentiment which they imagine to exist is in the Secretary of the Navy, John Roach, and the officers of the Navy alone. But a few minutes ago the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and myself in going to the marble-room fell into the hands of a captain of the Navy, a most excellent and distinguished gentleman and my personal friend, and he appealed to us for God's sake to vote for this bill. Said I, "My friend, you are mistaken; it is John Roach, it is for his sake, and the Almighty has nothing to do with it." John Roach has been tramping about these halls for ten years, ay, twenty years, assailing every man as a friend of Great Britain and an enemy of his country who did not pour money into his pocket and into his ship-yards.

Here is the report which the Senator from South Carolina read from yesterday, showing that when these four steel vessels were put up to public bidders there were only two bidders, Mr. Cramp and Mr. John Roach; and now the Secretary of the Navy is to have the power again not to put it out to the lowest bidder, but to put the work either into a navy-yard or to the lowest bidder as he may see fit. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] told us yesterday that he proposed to put the same limitations upon the power of the Secretary of the Navy that existed under the act of March 3, 1883, and I hold that in my hand, and I say that under the clause the Secretary of the Navy can either put this work into a navy-yard or he can put it up to the lowest bidder as he pleases. In other words, if he chooses to put it in the navy-yards and use it for political purposes he will do so, or if he puts it up to the lowest bidder he puts it up to John Roach and Mr. Cramp and nobody else. Nobody else under the terms of this bill can compete for these vessels.

Mr. HALE. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Nobody has pretended that I have heard that under the restrictions thrown around the bill of last year the Secretary was prohibited from building these ships in the navy-yards. That was left discretionary.

I have not lived long enough, luckily, to be of the opinion that everybody holding an important place in the executive branch of the Government is corrupt. This Government has run a great many years under different parties, with Secretaries of the Navy of all kinds of political opinion. It may be running for the next half-dozen years under an administration politically sympathized with by the Senator from Missouri. I do not presume that if that takes place, whoever is his President will put into the Navy Department a man who will deliberately favor one contractor at the expense of others. I expect, if I stay here, interested in and dedicating myself somewhat to this great work of building up the American Navy, if there is an administration in the hands of the Democratic party for the next four years, to be found urging whoever may be the Secretary of the Navy to go on and help build up the American Navy. I do not suppose that I shall find myself raking around among all the muck heaps of the past and intimating and insinuating that everybody is corrupt because he holds a high place.

Now, as to the subject of bidding, and this being a matter of John Roach and of his haunting the corridors of this Capitol and of his besieging Congress for ten years, the Committee on Naval Affairs, that is the sponsor of this bill, has neither seen nor heard of John Roach. He has made no approach to its room or to any of its members. I have not seen the man myself anywhere; but I do find that when the Secretary of the Navy submitted this question in this country to the ship-builders he was not confined to Mr. Roach, nor to Mr. Roach and Mr. Cramp, as the Senator from Missouri says, but that all the proposals were sent out abroad and at large; and on page 56 of the appendix accompanying the Secretary's report are found the bids, not simply of John Roach and Mr. Cramp, but of the other builders in the country, for all of these ships, duly opened and examined, and John Roach was below them in the aggregate over $300,000. Why was that? Because he had found out and nobody else had found out that he could furnish the steel out of which these ships were to be built for 5 cents per pound, and the other bidders bid on the basis of 8 cents per pound. He had ascertained, as he believed, and the work he has done since shows, that not only can he build with steel costing 5 cents per pound where the price was 8, which was bid by others, but at 4½ cents per pound, and that is one of the results of competitive bidding.

The Senator from Kentucky cites here the words that Admiral Porter uttered before the Committee on Naval Affairs in giving his testimony about something that occurred in the navy-yards years and years ago. That is old substance, dead matter, and the Senator from Kentucky ought to know it. I defy him or the Senator from Missouri to find in the administration of the Navy Department during the last two or three years a single instance where money has been diverted and has been sent to improper purposes, where it has not been spent judiciously and where we have not got dollar for dollar. Why it is that he is troubled about the navy-yards when all these ships are being built outside the navy-yards, and he knows that the navy-yards have been cut down in their force year by year by the present Secretary of the Navy and that there never was in the administration of his party or mine so clean and incorruptible an administration of the navy-yards of the country as there is to-day, I can not imagine.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I think I am about as amiable as the average Senator, but when a gentleman interjects an entire speech into my argument I think it is rather a stretch of courtesy. The Senator from Maine has paraded in his oration in answer not only to myself but to the Senator from Kentucky epithets like meteors from the northern skies. The words "muck heaps" and other elegant and graceful epithets are used by the Senator.

Who has made an allegation of fraud in the navy-yards? Who has brought that matter into this debate? It was brought here by the ally of the Senator from Maine, his assistant adjutant-general from South Carolina. He quoted Admiral Porter, and Admiral Porter says they took the money of the people of the United States in one of these navy-yards, which was sent there to construct a vessel, to put up a hot-house for one of the officers. And because on this side of the Chamber we dare to allude to the charges made by a Republican high in office and quoted here by one of the gentlemen of the committee who sustains this bill we are condemned by the Senator from Maine.

Why, Mr. President, who does not know that these navy-yards have been hot-beds of corruption? Who does not know that in the last Presidential canvass, when we had provided by law that no more money should be collected inside the navy-yards for political purposes, demands for assessments were made of one of the men in the navy-yard, I believe at Norfolk, and he was told that he should pay the political assessments and that a man would be outside the gate of the navy-yard to receive it. They could not collect it inside, but they put a man outside in order to receive it. Who does not know that the navy-yards have been hot-beds of corruption as I say? It is proven by their own testimony taken here. Now, the Senator from Maine says that I am suspecting every man in the public service. Mr. President, I have a right to refer to the experience of the people of the United States on this subject and to quote it here. Three hundred and eighty-five millions of dollars have been voted by the Congress of the United States to build a navy since 1866, and where is the Navy?

Mr. HALE. Not to build a navy, the Senator will allow me to say, but for all its running purposes.

Mr. VEST. To keep it up for the benefit of the country. Three hundred and eighty-five million dollars for naval expenditures of all sorts, fifty million more than the Government paid from its commencement up to 1860, and to-day where is the Navy of the United States and where is the money? Both are missing. Now, we say, wait and see whether the experiment is a success; wait until it is determined whether the vessels now building are what you say they are. We are told that in hot haste we must expend the enormous amount called for in this bill; and if we do not, we are told that we are deaf to the appeals of national honor and national defense!

Mr. President, at the proper time I propose to offer an amendment to this bill in regard to the construction of these vessels, if they are to be constructed, and I propose then to test the sense of the Senate as to whether the enormous power shall be given to the Secretary of the Navy which the Senator from Maine says he proposes to give him, or whether these vessels are to be constructed on the cheapest and most economical plan and given to the lowest bidder—not confined to any two or three ship-yards in the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the first amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I shall not delay the Senate with any attempt to reply to what has fallen from the Senator from Missouri in reference to myself. Like the Senator from Kentucky, he has erected a man of straw for the purpose of having the opportunity of knocking him down. He speaks of me as the ally of the Senator from Maine and his adjutant-general, and certain chaste, select, oratorical flights of eloquence that the Senator can use sometimes have been brought into play, and perhaps somebody else has indulged in that style of argument. Now, Mr. President, I am not the ally of any Senator upon this question; I am not the adjutant-general of any Senator upon this question. I am here discharging what I believe to be a public duty, and I want to say to the Senator from Missouri that he had better call a spade a spade; that when he opposes this bill he had better state in plain English, and not in meteoric flights of eloquence from the northern skies, what is the real meaning of the opposition. I will state it for the Senator. It is that he has no confidence in the honesty of the present administration of the Navy Department of the United States; it is because perhaps, as the Senator has intimated, some political advantage may accrue to the party to which the Senator and myself do not belong if we vote this sum of money to build these ships.

Sir, I hope that I am as loyal to my party as the Senator from Missouri; I hope I shall be found battling for its principles as earnestly as that Senator at the proper time; but he will pardon me if I refuse to subordinate a high public duty to the achievement of a party advantage. He will pardon me if I take issue with him upon that point. As I said in the opening of this debate, I am not here to defend the Navy Department of the United States nor am I here to attack it, but I am here to be just if I can, and I shall be just whether that justice accrues to the benefit of those who are opposed to me politically or of those who sympathize with me.

I believe conscientiously and sincerely that the demands of this country require, the interests of all the people, of all sections, of all parties, require that we shall proceed to build a navy or abolish it entirely. I believe that by the appropriation of four million or four and a half million dollars we shall accomplish the construction of some ships of which the American people will not be ashamed; and if at the same time some advantage may accrue somewhere that is not my fault.

I trust, Mr. President, that we have entered upon a new era in this country. While I sympathize and have sympathized with my political friends in their denunciations and anathemas against the administration of the Navy Department of this Government in the past, and while it is humiliating that we should admit it, I trust we have entered upon a new era, as I have said, and that we may at least proceed to discharge what I believe to be a high public duty without injecting into it mere party and political considerations.

I think the Senator from Missouri has gone entirely outside of anything that I have said when he accuses those of us who sustain and support this bill of having delivered lectures to those who differ with us on account of their want of regard for the honor of this country. I have made no such intimation, and I am incapable of making such an intimation as to any Senator. I want the Senator to vote against the bill if he thinks it ought not to pass, but to vote against it upon arguments which are worthy of the question, and I say that without any disrespect to the Senator's statements.

As has been said by my friend from Florida this morning, I know of no limitation upon the power of Congress to appropriate money to build ships for the American Navy. I submit that the statements I offered yesterday as to the condition of our seacoast defenses and as to the condition of the ships of the American Navy show that it is important, it is urgent that we should proceed and proceed at once, and not wait until December, to provide for the building of more naval ships.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Why "December?"

Mr. BUTLER. My friend from Florida asks "Why December?" I understood the Senator from Kentucky to state that he wants to see the ships already contracted for launched, as the Senator from New Jersey said yesterday to see whether they would swim. It is a very poor compliment to the naval advisory board to suspect that they would accept from the contractor a ship that would not swim.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the honorable Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I remember an experience this Government had in a not very long distant past. A ship was constructed by Mr. John Roach, who is now building the four steel vessels which are under construction, and four boards of naval survey appointed by the Navy Department under and by authority of the Congress of the United States declared that if the vessel was constructed in accordance with the contract and specifications her gunwale would be three inches under water.

Mr. BUTLER. There is John Roach again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But what became of that ship?

Mr. BUTLER. There is John Roach again, the bête noir of my friend from New Jersey and my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. MCPHERSON. No; I have a great respect for Mr. Roach. I admire his pluck, his enterprise, his progress. I do not blame Mr. John Roach, for competing with all comers for the business of the United States as well as for private business. I do not object to Mr. John Roach placing a representative in the Navy Department of the United States, if he could do so. I would not even object to that, because it is of no use to object. But what I do object to is this: I say that the contracts that have been given to Mr. John Roach for the building of these four vessels could not be successfully competed for by any other builder in this country. I say this upon the statement of one of the gentlemen who were asked to estimate for them. Said he, "Mr. MCPHERSON, if I could be assured that I could have the same inspector to inspect my work that Mr. Roach is sure to have, then I would gladly go in and estimate for these vessels."

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Why not provide for their construction in the navy-yards, then?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from New Jersey says he has a very high respect for Mr. John Roach.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I said for his pluck, for his enterprise, and for his progressiveness.

Mr. BUTLER. For his pluck, for his enterprise, and for his progressiveness.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not question his honesty in fair competition.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator does not question his honesty. Then we have the Senator down to some point where we can put our hand upon him.

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Now I want to say to the Senator that I do not know Mr. John Roach; I do not believe I know him by sight; and I want to say to the Senator from New Jersey and also to the Senator from Missouri that Mr. John Roach has not approached me and there has not been an officer of the United States Navy who has approached me on this bill except upon my own personal request. I do not know Mr. John Roach. The Senator from New Jersey says that he sustains Mr. Roach in his pluck, in his energy, in his management; and he does not blame him for putting a representative in the Navy Department, as I understood the Senator.

Mr. McPHERSON. If he could.

Mr. BUTLER. Upon that point I take issue with the Senator from New Jersey, and I say that when the Senator makes a statement of that kind, that Mr. John Roach has put a representative in the Navy Department, he ought to prove it.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator permit me to have the words I uttered read, that it may be seen whether I am guilty of all that is charged against me?

Mr. HALE. The very clearest kind of imputation was made.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, Mr. President, I understand the Senator to say that he has not charged that Mr. John Roach has put a representative in the Navy Department.

Mr. McPHERSON. If anybody has ever heard me say it, I should like to have him state it.

Mr. BUTLER. I will repeat that I do not know Mr. Roach, and no lobby has approached me upon this bill. If the lobby has approached the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from New Jersey and other Senators, it is their fault, not mine.

Mr. VEST. What does the Senator mean by a statement of that kind?

Mr. BUTLER. I simply mean precisely what I say.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator mean to say that anything has been said here about anybody being corruptly approached?

Mr. BUTLER. I made no intimation of that kind. I simply took the language of the Senator from Missouri himself. He said that he was approached in yonder lobby by officers of the Navy, and I say that I have not been approached. If he was approached, and permitted himself to be approached, it was his fault and not mine.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly, sir.

Mr. VEST. In order to indicate the anxiety felt for the passage of this bill by certain persons I stated that, as the Senator from Indiana and myself were coming from the marble-room, a gentleman high in standing and my personal friend, an officer of the Navy, had appealed to me for God's sake to vote for this bill. Now, the Senator from South Carolina makes the intimation——

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all.

Mr. VEST. That I permitted myself to be approached in an improper sort of fashion. I ask if the Senator thinks that is fair, manly, just, or generous?

Mr. BUTLER. No, Mr. President, I made no intimations or reflections on the honorable Senator, and I am a little surprised that a Senator who deals so largely as that Senator does in intimations should be so sensitive when I make a retaliation in kind. I will say to the Senator that nothing was further from my purpose than to cast any reflection on him, and I am amazed that a Senator who indulges in these insinuations so freely on this floor should be so sensitive about them.

Mr. VEST. What does the Senator mean by that?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator spoke of John Roach clamoring in the lobby of the Senate for the passage of this bill and of a lobby clamoring here with those of us who were urging its passage.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator say that Mr. John Roach is not lobbying?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

Mr. VEST. Why does he employ this language to me?

Mr. BUTLER. I am not making any charge against the Senator from Missouri. I am simply expressing some surprise at the sensitiveness of the Senator himself.

Mr. VEST. I permit nobody, here or elsewhere——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will please suspend. The Chair must insist upon Senators addressing the Chair and letting the Chair ascertain whether the Senator entitled to the floor consents to be interrupted. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly, sir.

Mr. VEST. I have said all that I need say.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will it be agreeable to the Senator from South Carolina to suspend his remarks on this matter for the time being?

Mr. BUTLER. Perfectly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have conferred with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] who has charge of this bill, and he knows perfectly what I have in view in asking him to move an adjournment at this time.

Mr. BUTLER. Before the Senator does that I should like to make one statement.

Mr. HALE. I propose at the close of the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina to make that motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish simply to make one additional statement and then I will close, and that is in respect to what has been intimated about corruption in the navy-yards. I have been taunted with introducing that subject into this debate by having had Admiral Porter's testimony read. Now, sir, there is no proposition, as I understand, to have these vessels built at the navy-yards to begin with. They are to be built by contract, let out in the usual way to the lowest bidder, and if Mr. Cramp or Mr. Roach or Mr. Hollingsworth or Mr. Gorringe or Mr. anybody else will put in the lowest bid I must assume that he will get the contract.

I know nothing about corruption in the navy-yards except what I have heard. I have no doubt there has been a great deal of corruption. I am very sorry for it. If I thought these ships were going into the navy-yards to be built upon the plan heretofore obtaining I would oppose the bill; but not believing that, and feeling sure that the advisory board will throw every protection around the construction of these vessels that honest men can throw around such a matter of business detail, I shall support the bill, and I should be sorry if the Senate should vote it down.

Mr. HALE. I learn that it is desirable for the other side of the Chamber to have a caucus at or near 4 o'clock, and with that view, although I am sorry we can not finish the bill to-night, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator indulge me until I offer an amendment to the pending bill?

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 27, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FUNDS IN THE TREASURY.

Mr. MORRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back the following resolution and recommend its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House how much money is now in the Treasury of the United States; under what several provisions of law it is there retained, and how much, in view of the current receipts, expenditures, and legal liabilities of the Treasury, on the basis of existing laws, can be applied at this time in liquidation of that part of the public debt now payable without embarrassing his Department.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Would it be in order to offer an amendment to that resolution?

The SPEAKER. It would be.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I ask that the resolution be amended so that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be required to furnish also the following information:

1. What number of distilleries in the United States each year from February 1, 1877, to 1884, inclusive.
2. What number of gallons from fruit, molasses, and grain, respectively, produced during each and every of those years in the States severally.
3. What part of each year's production was prepared for beverage or table uses; and what part for art, scientific, and other purposes.
4. What number of gallons of distilled spirits withdrawn from bonded warehouses under exportation bonds during each of those years.
5. What number of gallons of distilled spirits which were withdrawn from bonded warehouses under exportation bonds after having remained in bonded warehouses more than two years, and from which States so exported.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that that is not germane to this proposition.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will not make that point until I have had at least an opportunity of reading the entire amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I had the honor of introducing this resolution for reference to the Committee on Ways and Means with a view of obtaining this information which is of importance and it should stand by itself. It ought not to be mixed up with a matter which is essentially different.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I offer it, then, in the way of debate. This information is just as important.

The SPEAKER. It is not before the House, if the point of order is well taken, for debate.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not insist upon the point of order until I have finished the reading of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought the gentleman from Kentucky had completed the reading of the amendment; but will of course withhold a decision until he has had that opportunity.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. My amendment further provides that he shall also inform the House—

6. What number of gallons of distilled spirits, having remained in bonded warehouses more than two years, were withdrawn under exportation bonds during the years 1883 and 1884, and from which States so withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist upon the point of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I think, Mr. Speaker, it is of equal importance, in connection with the resolution reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, that we shall have this information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must sustain the point of order. The amendment is not before the House.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. VALENTINE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 5451) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some accessible point within five miles of the town of Decatur, in the county of Burt, in the State of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ALLEGED UNDERVALUATIONS.

Mr. HARDY. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas charges of fraudulent undervaluations of imported merchandise have been made by Government officials; and

Whereas importers affected by such charges claim that the same are unfounded, and are unjust to reputable merchants, hurtful to trade, and in violation of the policy of our Government, which is and has been to mature, protect, and encourage trade and commerce in all its branches; and

Whereas a large number of merchants, claiming that said charges are a serious injury to commerce and the public revenue, as well as to the interests of individuals, have petitioned this House to take cognizance of the matter and investigate the same: Therefore,

Resolved, That it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means to consider and report to this House as to the advisability of appointing a subcommittee of its own members or a special committee of the House to investigate the said charges of fraudulent undervaluations of imported merchandise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KASSON. If I heard rightly the preamble of the resolution, it contains a charge as of a fact that Government officials have made fraudulent undervaluations. If that be an allegation distinctly made instead of a direction to inquire if such charges have been made and by whom, I think it should be amended so as to state that such charges have been made. The habit of giving a sanction to such things without proof is what I object to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas charges of fraudulent undervaluations of imported merchandise have been made by Government officials; and

Whereas importers affected by such charges claim that the same are unfounded and are unjust to reputable merchants—

Mr. KASSON. I see it is owing to the grammatical construction that I caught my impression. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CONVERSE. I ask that the remainder of the resolution be again read.

The Clerk completed the reading of the resolution.

Mr. KELLEY. As there are judicial means of investigating all that, I object.

SPECULATION IN FARM PRODUCE, ETC.

Mr. LE FEVRE. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas speculation and gambling in American farm produce and other products of American labor has obtained such absolute control over their market value as to govern their price in this country and abroad, to the great and growing injury of American producers and consumers; and

Whereas the demoralizing influence and bad practical results from these causes are matters of record in the daily press: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be, and hereby is, requested to prepare and report a bill prohibiting the purchase or sale of wheat, corn, cotton, provisions, or other articles of prime necessity among the people unless an actual transfer of such property or a warehouse receipt therefor accompanies each transaction; or making any agreement for the same based on contracts extending over a period longer than ninety days from the date of such contracts wherein an actual and bona fide transfer of such property is contemplated; also, a bill authorizing such governmental interference as will insure stability to the value of such property and protect producers and consumers against the wrongs enumerated in the preamble to this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COX, of New York. I object.

Mr. LE FEVRE. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reference of the resolution?

Objection was made.

JAMES HALL AND OTHERS.

Mr. McCOID. I ask unanimous consent to offer for reference the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House the following specified sums to the persons herein named for services rendered as laborers in the employ of the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress, namely: To James Hall, $260; to Alexander Thomas, $260; and to Charles Carter, $260.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of this resolution for reference?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it go to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it should more properly go to the Committee on Claims, as it relates to services rendered in a former Congress.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Claims.

CUSTOMS REGULATIONS.

Mr. EATON. I ask unanimous consent to offer for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department be directed to ascertain and report to this House what customs regulations are now in use in the Department, and if any revision of said regulations has been made since 1874; and, if so, when and how?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. CHACE. I object.

STREET IMPROVEMENTS IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. ROCKWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be requested to transmit to the House estimates for grading and regulating G street southeast from Third street southeast to Eleventh street southeast; also, estimates for completion of Sixth street southeast, from Pennsylvania avenue to K street southeast, to be paved with asphalt blocks.

UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA.

On motion of Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. 503) to increase the endowment of the University of Alabama from the public lands in said State was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. REED. I demand the regular order.

WILLIE S. HOWARD.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I desire to make a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee on Accounts to make the report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution of Mr. HOLMAN—

"That the Committee on Accounts be directed to inquire into the propriety of Willie S. Howard being employed as a page or folder under the Doorkeeper during the residue of the present session of Congress and report by resolution or otherwise"— respectfully report the following resolution, and ask its adoption:

Resolved, That Willie S. Howard be, and is hereby, employed as a page of the House during the present session, and shall be assigned to duty at the subcommittee-room of the Committee on Appropriations until further ordered by the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ERMENTROUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded, which is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The SPEAKER. That will require a vote of two-thirds.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 100, noes 39.

So (no further count being called for) the morning hour was dispensed with—two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. STORM. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] to allow me to submit some reports from the Committee on War Claims. I shall be obliged to leave the city by order of the House for the purpose of taking part in an investigation at Hot Springs, and shall not be present when the committees are next called.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I will yield for that purpose.

JOHN W. MARTIN.

Mr. STORM, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 3266, the bill (H. R. 5452) for the compensation of John W. Martin for services as postmaster at Brookhaven, Miss., by order of the military commandant, from July, 1865, to July, 1866; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

ALEXANDER WORRALL.

Mr. STORM, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, also reported a bill (H. R. 5453) for the relief of Alexander Worrall; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AGNES AND MARIA DE LEON.

Mr. STORM, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, also reported adversely the bill (H. R. 2940) for the relief of Agnes and Maria de Leon, heirs at law of Rebecca de Leon, deceased; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

IMPORTATION OF ARMS BY NEW YORK.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have been instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back House bill 2450, to refund duties paid by the State of New York on arms imported in 1863, and to move that that committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the bill, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. It should go to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Committee on Claims is the proper committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] asks that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it should go to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. During the last five or six years similar bills of which I have cognizance have always gone to the Committee on Appropriations, and I myself have had charge of bills before that committee which included such accounts as this. It seems to me, therefore, that a reference of this bill to that committee is correct. And I will state that among the papers accompanying the bill is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury that it only requires that the bill go to the Committee on Appropriations to receive proper attention, as there is sufficient law for the purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, so that the House can make the proper reference.

The bill was read as follows:

Whereas an act entitled "An act to remit duties on arms imported by States," approved July 10, 1861, and the act supplementary thereto, approved July 25, 1861, have expired by limitation: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to refund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the duties paid by the State of New York on arms imported in 1863, amounting to the sum of $42,796.87, which sum includes the premium paid in the purchase of gold for the payment of said duties: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that the said arms were purchased in good faith for the use of the troops of the State of New York organized to aid in suppressing the then existing insurrection against the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] moves that the bill just read be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] moves to amend so as to refer the bill to the Committee on Claims. The question is first on the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say that the bill will be more likely to receive consideration in the Claims Committee than in the Committee on Appropriations.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, and upon a division there were—ayes 63, noes 42.

Before the result of the vote was announced Mr. HISCOCK called for tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do not do that.

Tellers were not ordered, there being but 14 in the affirmative—not one-fifth of a quorum.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was agreed to.

The motion as amended was then agreed to, and the bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on Claims.

FORGERY OF POSTAL MONEY-ORDERS.

Mr. BINGHAM, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 4907) to amend section 5463 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the forgery of postal money-orders, and for other purposes; which was placed on the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

IMPROPER USE OF THE MAILS.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, also reported adversely the bill (H. R. 1807) to prevent the use of the United States mails to advertise noxious and dangerous medicines, foods, and compounds; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SENATE CONTINGENT FUND.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution No. 64, providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a privileged matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. PHELPS. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back the resolution which was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM], instructing that committee to inquire whether any foreign minister had endeavored to nullify the effect of a unanimous resolution of this House by representations reflecting on the honor and integrity of its members, and to state that the committee has made such investigation, has obtained no information upon the subject, and ask that it be excused from the further consideration of the subject. That, it would seem to me, is a question of the highest privilege. Unless there be opposition to this request of the committee, I suppose the resolution and the report will take the usual course and lie upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] reports back a resolution from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and asks that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Several MEMBERS. Read the report.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred resolution No. —, to wit:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to make inquiry as to whether any foreign minister accredited to the Government of the United States has endeavored to nullify the effects of a unanimous resolution of this House by representations reflecting on the honor and integrity of its members"— beg leave to respectfully report:

That they have, under the instructions of the resolution, made inquiry, and have obtained no information as to whether any foreign minister accredited to the Government of the United States has endeavored to nullify the effects of a unanimous resolution of this House by representations reflecting on the honor and integrity of its members.

And the committee ask to be excused from the further consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the subject?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1490) to complete a statue of the late Rear-Admiral Samuel Francis Du Pont.

DISEASES AMONG DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the special order; and pending the motion I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon amendments which may be offered to the bill in Committee of the Whole may be closed at 3 o'clock, at which hour the committee shall proceed to vote upon all pending amendments.

Mr. BELFORD. I object.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Then I ask unanimous consent that debate may be closed at 4 o'clock.

Mr. WELLER. I object.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the bill and amendments shall be closed at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HILL. Does that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. HILL. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The House can not do more under the rules than close debate on the pending section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move, then, that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the pending section and amendments thereto be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. To what section does the gentleman refer?

The SPEAKER. The section now pending in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. WELLER. I do not know whether that is the second or the third section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. The third section.

Mr. WELLER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question must be decided by a vote of the House.

The motion of Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, to limit debate was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the special order, which is the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals. The pending section is section 3, upon which, with all amendments thereto, debate has by order of the House been limited to thirty minutes.

The clerk read the section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other infectious or contagious disease is declared to exist, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious or infectious disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, in paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to extirpate the disease: Provided, That the authorities of said State or Territory shall assume and pay one-half of the expense of the valuation of the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and one-half the cost of disinfection and necessary police regulations in the quarantine and care of infected herds of cattle.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, but if there are amendments of the committee to be disposed of I will withhold my amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments of the Committee on Agriculture, which are first to be voted upon, will be read.

The first amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out, in lines 9 and 10, the words "infectious or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

After the word "contagious," in line 10, insert "infectious or communicable."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "contagious," in line 13, strike out the word "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "infectious," in line 14, insert "or communicable."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 3 by inserting after the word "exist," in line 11, the words—
Or such State or Territory shall have adopted plans and methods for the suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and such plans and methods shall be accepted by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

So that the clause will read:

Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, or such State or Territory shall have adopted plans and methods for the suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and such plans and methods shall be accepted by the Commissioner of Agriculture; and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, in paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to extirpate the disease.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to move a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor if he wishes to be heard on his amendment.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I am prepared to say what I have on this amendment at this time. Now, as I read this section the rules and regulations have to go from the national authority and be accepted by the State authority, and that acceptance must be a legislative act. Therefore the Commissioner of Agriculture would have to spend many months in preparing rules and regulations, and by the time he had them prepared Legislatures of the State would not be in session to accept them.

I desire to say I see no difference whether the rules and regulations come from State authority and are accepted by the national authority or vice versa. All we want is harmonious co-operation between national and State authority for the extirpation of this disease.

Let me call the attention of the committee to the fact that in my own State of Illinois they have already acted in the premises. In 1881 the Legislature of that State passed a law the title and section-heads of which I will read. It is "an act to suppress and prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia amongst cattle." The first section provides for the appointment of veterinary surgeons; the second, for quarantine and slaughter of animals in case of epidemic; the third, for appraisement of slaughtered animals; the fourth, for prohibition of imported cattle during epidemic; fifth, for penalty for neglecting to report disease; sixth, for report of State veterinarian; seventh, for payment of claims for slaughtered animals; eighth, for State veterinarian's compensation and appraisers' and physicians' fees; and ninth appropriates $8,000 as a contingent fund.

I wish to direct the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture further to the fact that if my amendment be adopted and the bill shall become a law it can go almost immediately into operation, because the National Government can take advantage of the rules and regulations that State has already adopted. We heard yesterday from the gentleman from Iowa that his Legislature is now in session. By the adoption of this amendment to the bill the Legislature of that State could adopt rules and regulations which go into effect at once. But unless we amend the bill in this way it can not go into effect within two, probably, but certainly not within one year after its passage. It is unnecessary for me to remind members of the House that in several of the States the sessions of the Legislature are biennial.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and I hope by unanimous consent his amendment may be adopted.

Mr. BLAND. I ask that the amendment may again be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, this third section it seems to me is wholly unnecessary. In the first place, if under the proviso the authorities of said State or Territory shall assume and pay one-half of the expense of the valuation of the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter and one-half the cost of disinfection and necessary police regulations in the quarantine and care of infected herds of cattle, the State Legislature must first make an appropriation for the purpose. Hence no amendment to the section and no provision which does not recognize that fact can at all be effective.

What is the necessity for this section? It undertakes to put Federal power and Federal money into the police regulations of the several States. If it simply provided for a bureau whose duty it should be to investigate the character of these diseases and report as to their treatment and the best mode of transportation, &c., as provided in the first and second sections and then as to the prohibition of importation of diseased cattle from foreign countries and the transportation of diseased cattle from one State to another, that would be sufficient and there it should end. Then it would be impossible to transport diseased cattle from one State to another, and the disease would die out. We would then leave it in the power of the State to take care of their own cattle, and provide, as many States have already done by their Legislatures, for the extirpation of diseased cattle and making appropriations for that purpose. It would then give the States power to regulate the matter within their own limits without interference from the General Government. The danger is, if the Federal and State authority can combine, and there must be harmony and agreement, we must have the consent of the Legislature and an appropriation for the purpose. Then we have the further danger of the Federal Government undertaking by rules and regulations to hamper the industries of stock-raising in the various States. It can only do so by prescribing certain rules and regulations to be imposed upon stock-raisers tending to discourage the growth of that great industry. Taking the fourth section with the third you establish here a bureau in Washington the effect of which might be to encourage a stock gambling institution by which the value of the cattle throughout the country could be bulled and beared. Therefore, if the bill is to pass, the third and fourth sections should be stricken out, and that would leave it to the States under their rules and regulations to prohibit the transportation of diseased cattle from one State to another, and this disease of pleuro-pneumonia would then be extirpated without Federal interference.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to send up an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending proposition.

Mr. WELLER. I move an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for that purpose.

Mr. WELLER. It has been suggested by gentlemen around me that I withhold the amendment for a moment, but I apprehend that the time will be exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have an opportunity of offering it.

Mr. WELLER. Then I will withhold it until a vote is taken upon the pending amendment.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I did not understand that any objection was made to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Missouri as objecting to the section.

Mr. GIBSON. If I may be permitted to say a word in that connection, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois provides that although a State may adopt rules and regulations for the suppression of pleuro-pneumonia and the protection of cattle——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this proposition has been exhausted.

Mr. TUCKER. I move to strike out the last word.

I have not, Mr. Chairman, addressed the committee with reference to any of the provisions of this bill, preferring to withhold my objections until the committee had reached the consideration of this and the succeeding section. The third and fourth sections I regard as the most objectionable features of the whole measure.

This third section, in my judgment, gives the entire legislative authority over the question of the suppression of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious or infectious diseases among domestic animals to the Commissioner of Agriculture. What law is proposed to regulate the seizure and slaughter of animals? There is no law in that section covering the point, except that which authorizes the Commissioner of Agriculture to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the extirpation of these diseases. Now, sir, what are to be these rules or regulations that he is to frame or adopt for the guidance of this bureau? We do not know what they will be. There is no provision to indicate what they shall be in this bill. They are not prescribed by Congress; they are to be prescribed by an executive officer alone, who is to be the agricultural autocrat upon all these questions.

The amendment which has just been proposed is in the right direction, that the State, under its police power, shall have the sole right to extirpate this thing within its own limits.

Mr. GIBSON. But if the gentleman will permit me to suggest to him, the amendment does not do that.

Mr. TUCKER. Just hear me for a moment now, if you please. The whole extirpation of this disease within the State is left to the action of the Commissioner of Agriculture, who is to adopt these rules and regulations which are to stand in place of law; and it is a proposition that the Commissioner of Agriculture may adopt such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for slaughtering cattle where it is deemed necessary to do so.

Why, sir, gentlemen say we are sticklers for the Constitution. I am not talking now about the grants of power to Congress and the construction upon which the grants of power shall be interpreted; but I am talking of a provision of this law which goes against the express prohibition of the Constitution. The fourth amendment of the Constitution, arising out of the great case of Money and Leach in 1763, provides:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Where is there any warrant or affidavit prescribed by this bill before the seizure of or search for diseased cattle? There is none. Everything is left to the action of the autocrat of the Agricultural Department. He or his agents may seize any cow in any poor widow's cow-pen in the land and slaughter it at his or their sovereign pleasure.

Well, now, sir, furthermore, if gentlemen will examine this provision they will find that it gives the governor of a State the power to accept the rules and regulations which the Commissioner of Agriculture may prescribe. By what power is the governor of a State to determine that question or to accept the rules and regulations which shall subject the private property of citizens to seizure and destruction contrary to the fourth amendment of the Constitution?

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire further time?

Mr. TUCKER. I should like to have a little time.

Mr. KEIFER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TUCKER. I am very much obliged for the courtesy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the fifth amendment of the Constitution provides:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Now, what compensation is to be given to a man for property destroyed under the provisions of this bill? Under what rule or regulation shall he be compensated? None but the rules and regulations prescribed by the autocrat of the Agricultural Department. What right has he to pass a law providing for any proceeding, judicial or otherwise; and it ought to be a judicial proceeding that contemplates anything like the seizure of the property of a citizen or fixing the compensation therefor?

But, Mr. Chairman, I believe it is impossible for this committee to remedy the inherent vices of this and the succeeding section except by the recommitment of this bill. I say to my friend from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] that if this bill is recommitted, so that there can be some provision made in it by which these difficulties may be obviated and these objections removed, it will relieve a great deal of the doubt that I feel with reference to this measure.

But we have another difficulty, Mr. Chairman. I say that this Federal Government has no right to interfere with this question of pleuro-pneumonia inside of a State any more than the autocrat of all the Russias would have. Where is the power, sir, for it to do so? In the great case of Gibbons against Ogden, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, Chief-Justice Marshall delivering the opinion—and Chief-Justice Marshall was no stickler for State rights—it was declared in reference to commerce purely internal in its character that this Government could not touch it; and that it could only touch the question of commerce between the States or between the States and foreign countries.

Now, sir, I desire to say that this Government has only a right to interfere in the matter of pleuro-pneumonia so far as it is affected by interstate or foreign commerce. I believe that it may do that. I am perfectly willing that it shall do that by inspection laws, and that in deference to the police power of each State, which includes the right to determine upon the suppression of pleuro-pneumonia within its borders.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Did you not formerly entertain the opinion that a United States soldier had no right to cross your State in going from one part of the country to another or from one State to another?

Mr. TUCKER. Never in the world. Old Virginia never held that doctrine; but it was held by the State of Massachusetts before I was born, during the war of 1812.

Mr. KEIFER. I think it was very fortunate for the gentleman from Virginia that he did not have before him, or very distinctly in his mind when he spoke, the fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, otherwise we should have been deprived of the pleasure of listening to a constitutional argument here against this pleuro-pneumonia bill. As I have that amendment now before me I think it may be well enough to read it for the benefit of the gentleman, if not for that of any other member.

The proposition that the gentleman from Virginia lays down is that private property shall not be taken and that there shall not be unreasonable search, &c. But let us read the provision of the Constitution, and we will find that it has no relation whatever to such matters as are involved in this bill.

Article 4 of amendments to the Constitution is as follows:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

This amendment to the Constitution was adopted to prevent persons going and searching for property alleged to have been stolen, property that was alleged to belong to others, and without having first obtained a warrant authorizing the search or seizure.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. TUCKER. If my friend from Ohio will look back into the history of this matter he will find it all developed in the celebrated decision of Lord Camden in the case of Money and Leach, where it was not charged that the effects searched for and seized were stolen, but where there were warrants issued by the secretary of state to seize property that was never stolen at all.

Mr. KEIFER. The fact may be as the gentleman states. But if he is proposing to give us history it seems somewhat singular to state that this fourth amendment to the Constitution was adopted in consequence of some case that arose in the year 1763, about twenty-five years before the original Constitution was adopted.

Mr. KASSON. This is analogous to quarantine regulations, where the doctor takes possession at once.

Mr. KEIFER. I contend there is nothing in this that has any relation to the bill whatever. It is proposed to comply with the direct language of the Constitution when we propose in this bill the means of stamping out and eradicating a great public evil and great disease that is likely to injure every person in the Republic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. TUCKER. If I can take the floor I will yield my time to the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. There are but three minutes left of the thirty minutes to which debate on the pending section and amendments was limited.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to know if that order of the House cuts me off from offering my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not cut off the gentleman from offering an amendment. It merely precludes debate.

Mr. DUNHAM rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM]?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not want to cut off the gentleman from Illinois. I can state later what I desire to say further. Is debate closed on this section?

The CHAIRMAN. One minute remains of the time allowed for debate.

Mr. DUNHAM. Instead of offering any remarks of my own I shall occupy the time allowed me in submitting to the committee the following telegrams and a letter which I have received:

UNION STOCK-YARDS, ILLINOIS, February 26, 1884.

R. W. DUNHAM,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We hope you will vote against animal industry bill. It is objected to almost unanimously here. We guarantee protests against it by owners of 8,000,000 head of cattle.

GREGORY, COOLEY & CO.

CHICAGO, February 26, 1884.

R. W. DUNHAM,
House of Representatives, Washington:

We have not changed our minds as to our protest against animal industry bill.

KEENAN & HANCOCK.

CHICAGO, ILL., February 26, 1884.

Hon. R. W. DUNHAM:

Since signing the protest against the animal industry bill we have canvassed the matter thoroughly, and have become fully convinced that our views are correct and will work the greatest good to the greatest number.

R. STRAHAN & CO.

UNION STOCK-YARDS, ILLINOIS, February 18, 1884.

Hon. R. W. DUNHAM.
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Our names appearing on the remonstrance to the bureau of animal industry bill sent from Chicago February 11, we wish to say that our names are used without our knowledge or consent whatever. Will you please erase our names from the remonstrance, as we are entirely in harmony with the bill.

PALMER & RICHMAN.

UNION STOCK-YARDS, CHICAGO, February 18, 1884.

DEAR SIR: The petition sent you from here denouncing the pleuro-pneumonia bill, signed by several of the live-stock men, has the name of my firm on it. It was signed unbeknown to me, and I would respectfully ask you to have it erased, as I am in favor of the passage of the bill and want to see it passed. By erasing the name you will confer a great favor on me.

Yours, very truly,

JNO. H. WOOD.

Hon. R. W. DUNHAM, M. C., Washington, D. C.

Mr. WELLER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 3 the following words:
"And other stock, as horses, mules, asses, sheep, and swine."

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I make the point of order that that is not an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. KASSON. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] that he withhold his amendment until the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois shall have been voted upon.

Mr. WELLER. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] I will withhold my amendment for the present and offer it as an independent amendment after the vote is taken on the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WELLER. I now ask for a vote on my amendment, which I ask the Clerk again to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 3 the following:
"And other stock, as horses, mules, asses, sheep, and swine;"

So that section 3, when amended as proposed, will read as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said disease, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other infectious or contagious disease is declared to exist, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious or infectious disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations in paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to extirpate the disease: Provided, That the authorities of said State or Territory shall assume and pay one-half of the expense of the valuation of the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and one-half the cost of disinfection and necessary police regulations in the quarantine and care of infected herds of cattle and other stock, as horses, mules, asses, sheep, and swine.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. MULDROW. I move the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 3 by inserting after the word "disease," in line 20, the following:

"And whenever it becomes necessary to kill any diseased animal, as contemplated by this act, its value shall be ascertained and determined by the process adopted and furnished by the State where such diseased animal is found."

The amendment was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 51, noes 81.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to amend by adding to the section that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That the owner (agent or employé) of cattle alleged to be infected shall be notified when the inquisition or examination shall occur touching the disease of the animals alleged to be affected with pleuro-pneumonia or any other contagious disease.

The amendment was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 18, noes 60.

Mr. McCOID. I move to amend the section by adding that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That this act shall in no manner affect or interfere with commerce entirely within a State, but shall be enforced, as in this section provided, only in aid of the execution of such rules and regulations as the States may adopt relating thereto.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON. I now move to strike out the third section as amended.

The question was taken upon the motion to strike out, and upon a division there were—ayes 54, noes 103.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN said: No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order that no quorum has voted?

Mr. HOLMAN. If the one who submitted the motion to strike out does not make the point, I will not insist upon it.

Mr. BLAND. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Is not that point too late?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that time may be saved by recognizing the point of order as made in time.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, and Mr. GIBSON were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 77, noes 86.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

SEC. 4. That whenever a State or Territory, in any section of which a contagious or infectious disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, fails to make provisions for its extirpation or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

The Committee on Agriculture recommend the following amendment:

In line 2, before the word "infectious," strike out the word "or," and after the word "infectious" insert the words "or communicable;" so that it will read: "That whenever a State or Territory in any section of which a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease exists," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move to further amend the section by adding to it the words "into any other State or Territory or foreign country;" so that it will read: "to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district into any other State, Territory, or foreign country."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I had not intended at the opening of this debate to participate in it. But the letters which have poured in upon me from my people, from farmers, not from rings——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman submit any amendment?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move to strike out the last word. This debate has been going on in such a promiscuous manner that I had forgotten it was necessary to move an amendment in order to speak upon the bill. I say that letters have poured in upon me from farmers, not from rings, as has been said by my colleague [Mr. WELLER]. Some men are unfortunately so constituted that they seem to have been born with the idea that no measure can be brought forward in a legislative body unless some ring is the father of it.

The interests that are pressing this bill upon the attention of Congress nave no lobby here; they have no voice here but the voice of their Representatives. The voices that come up to us come from the simple farmers, from the grangers, from the agricultural associations of the country. They do not come from the giant cattle corporations that have been referred to so often, so eloquently, and so pathetically by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD]. All around this Hall stand the hard-fisted grangers and farmers, appealing to this body for relief in the direction proposed by this bill.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] and his associates on the Committee on Agriculture, including, I believe, my colleague from Iowa [Mr. WELLER], were in favor of this bill. While I am not on that committee, I think I am correct in saying that while in committee my colleague had no objection to this bill. I believe if he will answer for himself he will say that he favored this bill in each and every part of it while it was in committee, voted for the bill, and until he discovered on this floor that he belonged to the Democratic side of the House he did not dare to raise his voice against it.

The chairman of that committee and his associates, Democrats and Republicans, did their best to bring this bill before the House. It was not until gentlemen feared that it might interfere with some old time-honored notions that they attacked the bill. We now find that it has been fought for days and days——

Mr. COBB. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I prefer not to be interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] rises to a point of order.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I did not understand that.

Mr. COBB. I understand that the gentleman is referring to what took place in the committee. I understand that he is a member of that committee.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am not a member of the committee; I wish I was.

Mr. COBB. I beg pardon of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would rule that it is not in order to refer in the House to what has transpired in the committee-room.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to say——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I decline to yield now. The gentleman has been dancing around this Hall without knowing what side he is on. [Laughter.] He made a speech an hour long, and no man on this floor had intelligence enough, and he himself had not, to tell where he was until the time came for offering amendments to the bill, and now he has been going off like a popgun every ten minutes since against the bill. [Great laughter.] He will hear before he gets through from the solid farmers of Northern Iowa, whose apostle he claims to be, where the interests lie that are behind this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BELFORD obtained the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would like to occupy a few minutes longer.

Mr. BELFORD. I will give the gentleman three minutes, reserving two for myself.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I wish to say—and I will pass the other point, for I am in favor of this bill and not in favor of striking political blows here—I wish gentlemen to remember that this measure is to some extent an experiment. There may be mistakes in this bill; it may prove defective in its operation in some trifling respects; but we shall have this whole question within our reach again in a few months. If there should be imperfections in the bill this Congress can correct them. Do not let us stifle this call that comes to us from the great agricultural interests of this country simply because the Committee on Agriculture, with its able and honest chairman, in endeavoring to give us honest legislation, may have overlooked some defect in the measure. Let us make it as perfect as we can; and if it should not be all that may be desired, Congress at its next session can take up the subject and perfect this legislation. But we have before us now a measure based upon the fact that there is a terrible disease in our midst among our cattle and other animals. This is admitted on all sides. Let us do our best to grapple with this evil.

As to the constitutional question, let me say—and three minutes are but a brief time in which to express one's views on this great subject—the power conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce among the States embraces every incident necessary to such regulation. Is there any lawyer on this floor who will say that under this authority Congress can not go into any State and lay down such rules and regulations as are incidently necessary in carrying out the power to regulate commerce? Can we, under this power, merely say what shall be the rates of freight, high or low, on commodities passing from State to State? Is that the whole scope of the power to regulate commerce? This bill aims only to keep within the limits of a State diseased cattle which might otherwise go from State to State, spreading disease and death among animals in other communities. That is the whole purpose.

Upon such a measure as this I submit we should, like honest men, forget to which party we belong. I warn my friends on the other side that as partisans they can not afford to let the fact go to the people of this country that they killed this bill—pressed upon us as it is by agriculturists all over the land—simply because they saw coming from the shades of a dark and dim past a skeleton which may be reflected in this measure. To use the illustration of my friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], I say, for God's sake bury that for the time being, take hold of this legislation and put it through, and thus recognize the demand of the great agricultural and cattle interests of the land.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, I want it distinctly understood that my object in fighting this bill has been to make it as perfect as possible. I have so stated on this floor repeatedly. I have stated that in its present form this appears to me a dangerous bill. I have said that I had been informed by one of the cattle-kings of the West that one object in securing the passage of this bill was to destroy the thoroughbred stock of this country. In order to prevent this I want the bill so amended that the rights of men who own thoroughbred cattle shall be protected. But I am so anxious to extirpate and wipe out this disease—I have been in the position of the Pennsylvania Dutchman, sailing between Chile and Cherebogus [laughter]—that I will ultimately vote for the bill, bad and infamous as some of its provisions are. This is all I have to say on the subject.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, I am not very much surprised that my colleague [Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa], in the very outset of his remarks, should have violated a rule of the House by intimating what may have been or may not have been my action as a member of the Committee on Agriculture. I was not much surprised that he should make a personal assault on me——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman, just to make his speech more perfect, state what rule of this House I have violated?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] yield?

Mr. WELLER. No, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That is my only question. Let my colleague state what rule of the House I have violated—point to it—read it for the information of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to be interrupted.

Mr. WELLER. I repeat, I am not surprised that my colleague should have made a personal assault on me and assumed that I was the "head and front" of the agricultural interests of the great northeastern part of the State of Iowa. I am not surprised, because I remember very distinctly the connection which the gentleman is reputed to have had with the 2 per cent. assessment fund to keep the "grand old party" in power.

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that my object in opposing this bill, in the features in which I have made opposition, has been for the express purpose of perfecting it so as to aid and abet the animal industries of the great Northwest instead of putting them in the hands of a cattle ring.

I believe this bill is not only unconstitutional in many of its features, but that it is seriously detrimental to the interests of the people I have the honor to represent in part upon this floor.

I now wish to inquire, as it was asserted by the gentleman that my vote in the committee was in favor of this bill, how in the name of common sense did he ascertain that fact unless it was from some member of the committee?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. WELLER. In your own time, sir. [Laughter and applause.]

And I will make the further inquiry, Mr. Chairman, who drew this bill? What fertile brain, cunning in the framing of words into sentences, so devised as that they do not mean what to the casual reader they appeared to, formulated the bill that is presented for our adoption? Who presented it to the Committee on Agriculture for their action? Where was the plan concocted that gave us this wonderful bill with all its wonderful provisions? I will let echo answer for the time being.

Mr. HORR. Oh, no! Let us have it now.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will let us know now.

Mr. WELLER. I will let echo answer for the time being. [Laughter and applause.] There will come a time when the distinguished gentleman on this side of the House will have abundant opportunity. The gentleman says I fly around from one side of the House to the other. Let me admit that for argument's sake. I ask my colleague from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], how is it you are willing to-day to associate with, and ofttimes to walk, talk, trade, eat, sleep, drink, and pray with Democrats; then howl, "Oh, these cursed Democrats! You can not trust them?" [Laughter and applause.] I have wondered at a class of orthodox religion which some distinguished gentlemen on this side of the House seem to be possessed of. I remember up in Iowa, in the district the gentleman represents, of this occurrence: It was on communion day and they were to have a love-feast. Prominent Democrats and prominent Republicans were invited by the minister to come to the altar and bow there. The minister dispensed the wine and the bread, and blessed them.

Mr. BELFORD. The wine to the Democrats and the bread to the Republicans. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WELLER. Just wait a minute, my friend. [Laughter.] After communion the minister told them to depart in peace and sin no more. Yet after that Republicans rose up and said——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLER. Yet the Republicans rise up and say: "Oh, these Democrats! You can not trust them." [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I object.

Mr. WELLER. But I rise to a parliamentary inquiry [laughter], and the parliamentary inquiry I desire to make, Mr. Chairman, I will state.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. My inquiry is whether the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture can make objection under the present circumstances with good grace and courtesy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would decide that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move the committee do now rise.

Mr. EVERHART. I desire to offer an amendment to the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I will withhold my motion to rise for the present.

Mr. EVERHART. I move to add the following to the fourth section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no State or Territory or part thereof shall be declared in quarantine if the governor of the same shall officially certify to the President of the United States he is satisfied from thorough investigation no such disease as aforesaid, dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, exists therein.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 64.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. EVERHART and Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 115, noes 64.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. MULDROW. I offer the following amendments to the fourth section.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2, strike out "of" and insert "in."

In line 2, strike out "and contagious, infectious, or communicable" and in lieu thereof insert "pleuro-pneumonia."

In lines 3 and 4, strike out "the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation."

Mr. MULDROW. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to say only a word in advocacy of that amendment. The supporters of this bill in their speeches and arguments for its passage have advanced the idea that pleuro-pneumonia is the great disease that they desire to stamp out as being most dangerous to the cattle interests of this country. Yet their bill goes far beyond what we had a right to expect from the speeches and arguments which have been used in support of it. Now, if the object of the bill is as they claimed, to extirpate pleuro-pneumonia from the country, let the bill be confined to that purpose, and not give the Commissioner of Agriculture the power, upon his own volition and in the exercise of his own discretion, to declare States in quarantine for other purposes than the suppression of this disease. The arguments of gentlemen have been confined to that point, and I submit that those reasons which have been urged on this floor for the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia should find their embodiment in this bill. The object of my amendment is, therefore, in brief, to confine the bill to the objects that its supporters claimed for it, that is to say, the extirpation of this single disease, pleuro-pneumonia.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Let the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 73.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Let us have tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, and Mr. MULDROW were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 73.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to strike out——

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, as I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. BAYNE. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I am satisfied that the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi to this fourth section is such an amendment as will destroy the efficiency of the section, if not of the bill; and I am satisfied that the committee have not fully considered the importance of the amendment, or that its purpose, as far as the fourth section, at any rate, is concerned, is to destroy its effect. Having been adopted, in connection with the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and thereby destroying the effect of this section, I move that the fourth section be stricken from the bill.

Several MEMBERS. Agreed.

Mr. RANDALL. Universally.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to inquire if that motion to strike out does not also include the amendment of my colleague from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Yes, sir. It was not only amended in that particular, but the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi destroys the symmetry and purpose of the entire section.

Mr. BAYNE. It was my purpose to offer substantially an amendment which would have stricken out this clause.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. We have had two very fair and distinct votes indicating the sentiment of the committee. They have been developed in the vote by tellers; one on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and one on that of the gentleman from Mississippi, just adopted. The section is therefore of no avail in regard to the purposes of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Did not the gentleman himself move to strike out the fourth section.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I did for the reason stated.

Mr. MULDROW. I do not think that my amendment was calculated to destroy the symmetry of the bill, but to confine it to the legitimate sphere to which it should be confined according to the arguments of gentlemen who are in favor of its adoption.

Mr. VALENTINE. Is the bill of any practical use with that section stricken out?

Mr. BAYNE. I think it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That in order to promote the exportation of live-stock from the United States the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make special investigation as to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia, or any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease along the dividing lines between the United States and foreign countries, and along the lines of transportation from all parts of the United States to ports from which live-stock are exported, and make report of the results of such investigation to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, from time to time, establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live-stock as the results of said investigations may require.

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to take any part whatever in the discussion with reference to this bill either in the committee or in the House, knowing full well that there are so many other gentlemen here who know so much more about the questions involved than I do and who are so much more able than I to discuss them. I have noticed, however, that serious and persistent objections have been made to this bill and many, if not all, of its sections by a member representing a part of the State of Iowa [Mr. WELLER], and I deem it my duty to follow the worthy example of my distinguished colleague [Mr. HENDERSON] and let it be known that I am interested in the passage of this measure. I have regretted very much that my colleague [Mr. WELLER] should oppose this bill, for I had hoped that gentlemen representing a part of the good State of Iowa upon the floor of this House would unite cordially and earnestly in support of this important measure.

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor of representing here nineteen counties of Northwest Iowa. The people of these counties are largely devoted to agriculture and stock-raising. Years ago, about twelve or perhaps less, they were largely devoted to wheat-raising, but unfortunately for a number of years the grasshoppers by the millions poured in upon them and swept their grains of all kinds from the face of the earth; the hot winds and weather of summer came again and again, and the result has been that while there is considerable wheat grown there yet, it must be confessed that crop is not regarded as certain and profitable as we could and do wish. In consequence of these facts the people have naturally enough turned their attention to stock, and have become largely interested in stock-raising. The result has been that in that fair portion of Iowa, the northwest section, comprising nearly one-fifth of the State, a large and successful industry has grown up and the numbers of hogs and cattle have wonderfully multiplied.

It will be seen at once that the legislation, State and national, which tends to protect this stock now and hereafter to be grown in that and other portions of Iowa from the destructive ravages of fatal disease is just what the people living there desire. It is also in my opinion clearly their due, that they and all others similarly situated the country over have such protection of the kind indicated as it is within the constitutional power of Congress to afford.

I need not stop, sir, to inquire how much others in this land, and for that matter in other lands as well, will be benefited by the enactment of a law calculated, as this proposed enactment is, to protect the stock of the entire country from the poison of disease. That point has been ably made by other gentlemen upon this floor during the debates in the House and committee.

Now, sir, in view of the vast importance of this measure, not only to my immediate constituency, but to the vast country represented here, I have not felt satisfied to have my record rest alone upon my vote in favor of this measure.

I wish it known to my constituents that I not only favored this bill by voting for it, but also that I urged its favorable consideration, even though briefly and feebly, upon the attention of the Representatives of the people assembled in this Hall, with a view to the advancement of the material interests of the people whom I have the honor to represent in the American Congress.

Before closing my remarks I desire to make further reference to my colleague from Iowa [Mr. WELLER], who represents the fourth Congressional district of that State. We have had a few speeches from him every day in which this bill has been under consideration, and they have uniformly been in opposition to it. He has opposed it strenuously, and I may say in some respects quite ably. But I wish to call the attention of the committee to one argument made on yesterday, if I am not in error, illustrative of some of the grounds of his opposition to the bill. The gentleman is a constitutional lawyer; at all events he declares the bill to be unconstitutional. He is also, I take it, an ardent believer in so-called personal liberty, and proposes that neither his constitutional nor personal liberties shall be encroached upon.

On yesterday, to illustrate his argument, he supposed himself to be engaged in raising hogs. He supposed further that the hog-cholera, which in many portions of our land prevails so alarmingly and so destructively, should break out among his drove of hogs and many of them should die of the disease. He indulged the further and more gratifying supposition that quite a number of his hogs recovered from the disease, and that in course of time he had loaded a car of the same hogs, duly recovered or supposed to have been healed of their malady, in a car and had started on his way to the markets. The disease breaks out among them again on the way, and the astounding query arises in the mind of the gentleman whether in this land of large and magnificent personal and constitutional liberty the officer charged with the execution of this law, if it becomes such, is to be allowed to arbitrarily command the gentleman to halt and unload his hogs for inspection and possible slaughter. My friend seems astounded at the thought of such an absolute overthrow of constitutional liberty.

My distinguished colleague from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has taken occasion this afternoon to criticise my friend from the fourth Congressional district of our State [Mr. WELLER] and to remind the committee that it seems strange that his colleague should have interposed such violent opposition to this bill since it was taken up for discussion, when, as it is understood, he made no objections to it when before the Committee on Agriculture, of which he is a member, but supported it then.

If my friend [Mr. HENDERSON] had referred to the remarkable sketch of my and his colleague [Mr. WELLER] which appears in the Congressional Directory of the Forty-eighth Congress, he would have seen at a glance that it is no strange matter that our friend [Mr. WELLER] should be on all sides of this question. What do we find solemnly recorded as the gentleman's history? On page 27 of the Directory we are told, among many other things too numerous to mention, that he was born and reared a Democrat of the Jefferson and Jackson school, but that he voted for Frémont, Lincoln twice, Grant once, Greeley, Tilden, and, for Heaven's sake, last and least, Weaver, meaning James B. Weaver, of Iowa. We further learn from the same authentic source that during his active and, I trust, useful career he found time to till the soil, and study law, politics, and theology all at one and the same time; that he succeeded in being admitted to politics at once, later to the courts, and finally, which is somewhat doubtful, to the church. Is it any wonder he is on both sides of this question? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WELLER. I move to amend by adding one more word.

Mr. STRUBLE. I should like just one minute more.

Mr. WELLER. I will give the gentleman one minute.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Chair will recognize me I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not recognized the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HENDERSON, but he has recognized the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. WELLER.

Mr. WELLER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. STRUBLE. I should like to have three minutes.

Mr. WELLER. I yield the gentleman two minutes, which is quite enough for a gentleman of his eminent ability.

Mr. STRUBLE. I wish to recur to the supposed case which the gentleman stated yesterday, in which he imagined himself on the way to market with a car-load of diseased hogs.

The gentleman says he is a Democrat of the Jefferson and Jackson school. I wish to say to the gentleman that, in my humble opinion, if Thomas Jefferson should rise from his grave and should come in contact with my friend on his way to market with his car-load of diseased hogs, and Mr. Jefferson should have authority in the case, and Mr. WELLER refused to obey his reasonable commands, but persisted in going on, that distinguished statesman would seize his magic fiery pen, and in an instant write my friend beyond the pale of civilization. And if stern old Andrew Jackson should rise from his honored grave and be called upon to judge the case, and my friend persisted against Jackson's positive orders in attempting to reach a market with poisoned hogs, that old hero of many battles would draw from its scabbard his old sword and cut his [Mr. WELLER'S] head off close below his ears. [Great laughter.]

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised at the position my distinguished colleague [Mr. STRUBLE] has taken in the premises in this matter. I am of the opinion if the spirits of Jefferson and of Jackson were to come forth and proclaim their views upon this bill they would not only emasculate from it that which I have sought to do, but they would sweep the bill into oblivion and would suggest the propriety of having a bill so framed that constitutional lawyers, such as we have heard discussing the premises of this bill, should find none of the grave objections to it that they have urged. I am of opinion further that if Jefferson or Jackson were to make provision for the taking of my property in transit under the circumstances which have been related they would see to it first that I as a farmer should have some provision by which immunity should be granted to me before jeopardizing me as this bill jeopardizes, in my judgment, every dollar's worth of property in the great Northwest especially and in the West.

I desire to conclude the little narrative that I was about to relate when interrupted. Only a short time ago in the State of Iowa, in the third Congressional district, on a holy Sabbath day, I attended church services.

Several MEMBERS. Good!

Mr. WELLER. I did not see there, however, my friend the distinguished gentleman from the third Congressional district [Mr. HENDERSON].

A MEMBER. He was attending his own church.

Mr. WELLER. I make mention of this in order to show the spirit that is moving some men to action, to show that there are many willing to be patriotic to party who forget to be patriotic to principles. I found that they were giving out an invitation for members of their church to come to the communion altar and partake of the bread and wine. I saw a distinguished Democrat who upon that invitation went to the altar, and I saw a distinguished national-bank Republican go there too. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLER. I ask permission to print the remainder of my remarks.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That should be allowed, as my colleague was interrupted in the middle of the sacrament.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the committee do now rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. GIBSON. I have a substantial amendment to offer; and I submit that the gentleman from Missouri can not make that motion while there are substantial amendments to be disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to make that motion.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. Did not the Chair recognize me as seeking consent to print the remainder of my remarks, having broken me off twice at about the same point?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask unanimous consent now that the gentleman from Iowa have leave to print the remainder of his remarks.

Objection was made.

Mr. COSGROVE. I want to hear it rather than to read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the House resolve itself into committee for the further consideration of the special order, and pending that motion I move all debate on the pending section and amendments thereto be limited to two minutes.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate upon the pending section and all amendments thereto is limited to two minutes.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Is there any amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment reported from the Committee on Agriculture. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

After the word "contagious," in line 4, insert the word "infectious;" so that if amended the section will read as follows:

"That in order to promote the exportation of live-stock from the United States the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make special investigation as to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia, or any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease along the dividing lines between the United States and foreign countries."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. If in order, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is in order.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I make that motion.

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point of order that that motion is not now in order pending the consideration of the bill by sections under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the rule to be read.

Mr. KEIFER. The motion would be in order at the proper time.

The Clerk read as follows:

A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend; and, if carried, shall be considered equivalent to its rejection. (Rule XIII, section 7.)

Mr. KEIFER. That refers generally to motions to amend, not to the amendment of a section or paragraph under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been held that at any stage of the consideration of a bill a motion to strike out the enacting clause is in order.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not desire to appeal, but I think if the Chair will examine the question further he will see that I am correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the sanction of the Journal Clerk and of parliamentary law.

Mr. PETERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PETERS. Does the order of the House to limit debate to two minutes apply to the motion to strike out the enacting clause?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not debatable at all, as the Chair understands.

The question was taken upon the motion to strike out the enacting clause; and upon a division there were—ayes 114, noes 114.

Mr. KASSON. Let the Chair vote so as to save agriculture.

Mr. KEIFER. The motion to strike out is lost.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Will not the Chair announce the vote?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has announced the vote.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. And, under the rules of the House, the motion is lost.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers have been demanded, and the Chair would prefer that the question be decided by a vote by tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, and Mr. THROCKMORTON were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 114, noes 118.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The announcement of the result of the vote was received with applause.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to move an amendment to this fifth section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GIBSON. I move to amend in lines 4 and 5 by striking out the words "or any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease;" so that if so amended the section will read:

That in order to promote the exportation of live-stock from the United States the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make special investigation as to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia along the dividing lines between the United States and foreign countries, &c.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to inquire what has become of the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to report this bill to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture with instructions?

The CHAIRMAN. That proposition was never entertained by the Chair.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to vote for a bill that will provide for the proper inspection of the meat products of the country——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] stated that he would submit that motion at a fitting opportunity.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understood that it was now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not yet pending.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman will make his motion now.

Mr. RANDALL. I will make the motion whenever the opportunity presents itself. I think it is now manifest that the House is ready to recommit the bill with a view to get it into better shape.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain the motion in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] will be voted down, for the reason that to adopt it would destroy not only the symmetry of the bill, but interfere with the purpose of the bill.

Mr. KASSON. And destroy half its usefulness.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. It would have been better to strike out the enacting clause of the bill than to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. GIBSON. I thought the gentleman said his bill was intended to apply to pleuro-pneumonia.

The amendment of Mr. GIBSON was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

SEC. 6. That to prevent the exportation from any port of the United States to any port in a foreign country of live-stock affected with any infectious or contagious disease, and especially pleuro-pneumonia, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to take such steps and adopt such measures, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as he may deem necessary.

The Committee on Agriculture recommend the section be amended by striking out the words "infectious or," before the word "contagious," and inserting after the word "contagious" the words "infectious or communicable."

Mr. POTTER. It seems to me that the section just read is a proposition to commit the power of legislation on a subject of this importance to the executive department of this Government, to the Secretary of the Treasury. In my judgment if there were no other objection to this bill that would be a sufficient reason for recommitting this bill.

The discussion upon this subject shows that the most important object to be attained is that the exports of this country shall be protected so that foreign markets shall be kept open to the agriculturists of this country. What is here proposed? The Committee on Agriculture have brought in a bill which has no legislation upon the real purpose of the bill, but according to the statements of the committee it provides simply that the Secretary of the Treasury shall legislate upon this subject for the country. For one, sir, I am unwilling to transfer the legislative powers of this Government upon this vast subject, involving thousands of millions of dollars, to the Secretary of the Treasury. If the committee who have had this bill in charge have not been able to formulate a bill which shall protect the exports of this country, then I think they should try again.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I will simply state, for the information of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER], that an enactment similar to this has been in force for years and is the law at this time.

Mr. POTTER. Well, it is time to stop it.

A MEMBER. And the power has never been abused.

The question being taken, the amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That no railroad company within the United States whose road forms any part of a line of road from one State or Territory to another, or from a State into the District of Columbia, or the owners or masters of any steam or sailing or other vessel or boat, shall receive for transportation, or transport from one State or Territory to another, or from any State into the District of Columbia, any live-stock affected with any contagious or infectious disease, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia; nor shall any person, company, or corporation deliver for such transportation to any railroad company, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, any live-stock, knowing them to be affected with any contagious or infectious disease; nor shall any person, company, or corporation drive on foot or transport in private conveyance from one State or Territory to another, or from any State into the District of Columbia, any live-stock, knowing them to be affected with any contagious or infectious disease, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia.

The following amendments, reported by the Committee on Agriculture, were severally read and agreed to:

In line 8, strike out the word "or" and insert after the word "infectious" the words "or communicable."

In line 13, strike out the word "or" and insert after the word "infectious" the words "or communicable."

In line 18, strike out the word "or" and insert after the word "infectious" the words "or communicable."

Mr. MULDROW. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 8 and 9 of section 7, strike out the words "any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and especially the disease known as."

In lines 13 and 14, strike out the words "any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease" and insert "pleuro-pneumonia."

In lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and especially the disease known as."

Mr. MULDROW. If these amendments be adopted the language of the bill in lines 7, 8, and 9 will be, "any live-stock affected with pleuro-pneumonia." In lines 12, 13, and 14 it will read, "knowing them to be affected with pleuro-pneumonia;" and the language in lines 17, 18, and 19 will be the same.

The effect of these amendments, as will be seen, is to confine the provisions of this section to the disease of pleuro-pneumonia. This section provides that no railroad company shall receive for transportation from any State or Territory to another or from a State into the District of Columbia live-stock affected with any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease. The object of the amendment is to confine this prohibition so that it will apply only where animals are affected by the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia. I believe this is far enough to go in a bill of this character.

Mr. KASSON. We want a measure of this kind to apply to diseases of swine and other diseases of that character.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW]. The State of Kansas has lost more in dollars through the destruction of cattle by the Texas fever than has ever been lost by any other disease affecting cattle, and especially pleuro-pneumonia. If the gentleman who offers this amendment desires to shut up the air-hole of the barrel and open the bung-hole, that is the precise effect of his amendment. If you limit this bill so as to be applicable to no other disease of domestic animals than pleuro-pneumonia, the measure will be valueless to the large cattle interests of the West; and it seems to me no one acquainted in any way with those interests can view this matter in any other light. If members of the House desire to deprive the large cattle-producing interests of the West of any relief from this bill, let them vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I have not thus far participated in the debate on this bill, not because I did not feel a profound interest in the measure, but because others better informed have thoroughly discussed nearly every provision of it. But the motion just made makes it incumbent upon me, I think, as a duty to the people I in part represent, to say a word.

The cattle of the State of Missouri and the State of Kansas are immediately exposed to infection from a disease imparted by Texas cattle, and I hazard nothing in saying, as my colleague [Mr. PETERS] has just said, that more cattle have been destroyed in my State by Texas fever alone than have ever been destroyed in the United States by pleuro-pneumonia.

I was astonished a little while ago when the motion was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to put it in the power of the governor of a State to prevent, by his objection, the State from being quarantined. There is no adequate protection to the great cattle interests of Missouri, Kansas, Iowa, and all the Territories adjoining the State of Texas except by quarantine, and the gentleman who has charge of this bill, and who thus far has managed it in the main with credit to himself, ought not, it seemed to me, have sat in silence and allowed that amendment to prevail.

In my judgment it emasculated the bill. It left the rest of the provisions of the bill powerless to protect the great cattle interests of the West from pleuro-pneumonia or the Texas fever.

Now, Mr Chairman, if this is to become simply a pleuro-pneumonia bill, it will fail of the purpose of the Committee on Agriculture and it will fail to meet the demands of the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WELLER rose.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Kansas, who has not taken the floor before.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I do not wish to hold the floor long.

Mr. WELLER. I believe I am recognized to move a substitute.

Mr. BELFORD. How does the statute of limitations run against the gentleman from Iowa? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I desire to oppose it. I think it only necessary to call attention of the committee to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, and to add to the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas that the sections of the bill which have been already perfected by the action of the committee look to the main object and purpose for which it was designed and reported, and that is the establishment of a bureau of animal industry in the Department of Agriculture, which shall have jurisdiction and control over all matters affecting the animal industries of the country. Not cattle alone, but like the reports we are receiving month after month and year after year, as to the number and value and condition and diseases of domestic animals; it is just as important the Commissioner should have this power over horses and dogs and sheep as over cattle. This information is valuable to all engaged in animal industry, just as much so as the information now disseminated is to the farmers. That information is published in monthly reports. From time to time we have annual reports. Those who were here in the Forty-seventh Congress will remember the great demand for the volume on contagious diseases of animals and the efforts to increase the number published so as to supply all who sought that information. The request for it came from every part of the country.

This, then, is no new provision. It has been carried out for seventeen years, and we only desire to extend and perfect it. And there is no reason why, after passing the first three sections, the House should destroy the symmetry of the bill by adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, and I hope it will be disagreed to.

Mr. WELLER. I move to substitute the tenth section of the bill for the pending seventh section, and I ask that the tenth section be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That it shall be the duty of the several United States district attorneys to prosecute all violations of this act which shall be brought to their notice or knowledge by any person making the complaint; and the same shall be heard before any district or circuit court of the United States or Territorial court holden within the district in which the violation of this act has been committed or the person or corporation resides or carries on or has his or its place of business.

Mr. CALKINS. I make the point of order that the proposed substitute is not germane to the subject-matter of the pending section. They refer to entirely different subjects, one to railroad transportation and the other to the duties of the district attorney.

Mr. WELLER. I am clearly of the opinion that one is germane to the other, and I ask the pending section be read so it may be seen they are.

Mr. BAYNE. It would be somewhat extraordinary, Mr. Chairman, if one part of the bill should not be germane to another part. It seems to me one section must be cognate to the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has often put the same remark as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but has always been overruled. The seventh section relates to transportation and the tenth to the prosecution of violations of this act. The Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. WELLER. Then I move to substitute the eighth section for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to notify, in writing, the proper officials or agents of any railroad, steamboat, or other transportation company doing business in or through any infected locality, and by publication in such newspapers as he may select, of the existence of said contagion; and any person or persons operating any such railroad, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, or owner or custodian of or person having control over such cattle or other live-stock within such infected district who shall knowingly violate the provisions of section 7 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I make the same point of order on that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will determine the point of order after the committee has risen to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 321) amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase-money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands," approved June 16, 1880; and

A bill (S. 777) granting a pension to Albert Jehle.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 3926) to repeal the act of July 2, 1862, and such sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States as perpetuate the oath prescribed in said act; in which amendments the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

DISEASES OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order against the substitution of the eighth section for the section now under consideration, proposed by the gentleman from Iowa. The Chair overrules the point of order, as there is a relation between the subjects embraced in the sections under consideration which makes the one germane to the other.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago I succeeded in getting a national-bank orthodox Republican at the altar of mercy, and I have made up my mind to leave him there in hopes that repentance will come in due season.

I desire to discuss very seriously this matter now under consideration, for I wish to reply to the suggestions of my colleague from Iowa and repel the insinuation that I am averse to adopting a proper bill covering this ground. I am not. I am most earnestly in favor of the passage of a bill that is wise, the provisions of which will protect the animal industries of the great Northwest.

Now let us see. I find by the tenth section of this bill that the United States district attorney, if he is informed by any one of an infraction of this law, can arraign and prosecute such person on information; and if it is found that there has been a violation of the terms of the seventh section of this bill, then the eighth section comes in and subjects the offender to the payment of a penalty which may range all the way from $100 to $5,000.

And yet this bill nowhere makes any provision for immunity to the men who are raising hogs and horses and mules and other stock like sheep, &c. I fail to find that this bill in any of its provisions contemplates the appropriation of a dollar for them. Why, look at the matter. We have $250,000 provided in this bill for the whole United States; and yet I am told by a distinguished gentleman on this floor that it cost Massachusetts nearly $250,000 to exterminate pleuro-pneumonia in that one State. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars! What are you going to do with all of the people and their industries in this land, in the great Northwest, in the Southwest, in the West and South? I have been of the opinion from first to last that it has been the spirit of this bill to provide against pleuro-pneumonia, and for no other purpose except the extraordinary one of putting the stock of the farmers of the great Northwest in quarantine, or making the farmers quarantine their own stock, without providing a single dollar for their payment, if under the operation of the bill they are compelled to submit to their stock being slaughtered, or even providing a horse-doctor to determine whether they are sick or well. I believe this bill is a very bad bill for the people that I have the honor in part to represent and for the people who are represented by my colleague from the great northwest of the State of Iowa.

I hope, therefore, that this bill will be sent back to the committee. I believe the suggestion of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was a proper one. In my judgment this bill should be sent back to the committee and they should be required themselves to formulate a bill. I meant something when I made the inquiry as to who had prepared the provisions of this bill. I meant something when I made the inquiry who presented this bill to the Committee on Agriculture.

Several MEMBERS. Tell us who it was.

Mr. WELLER. I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to violate the rules of this House by telling what occurred in the committee-room; but I wish that I might be given permission, that I would be at liberty here to exculpate myself from the charges that have been presented that I was in favor of one side of this question in the committee-room and another on the floor of this House.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. We have a rule of this House which reads as follows:

No member shall speak more than once to the same question without leave of the House, unless he be the mover, proposer, or introducer of the matter pending, in which case he shall be permitted to speak in reply, but not until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

Now, the point of order I make is that the gentleman from the State of Iowa has been on his feet every five minutes since this bill was under discussion. He is absolutely worse than the Ohio floods. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know——

The CHAIRMAN. There is a point of order pending. The Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Colorado on the ground that it was made too late. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. WELLER. I now rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] stated that he rose to a point of order.

Mr. WELLER. I stated I rose to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. The inquiry I desire to make, being a new member, is this: Whether it would be proper for me to suggest to the gentleman from Colorado the reason why I have risen so often to-day upon this floor was that I did not get up this morning at 5 o'clock and take sundry Republican inspirations, as it might appear the gentleman from Colorado is accustomed to do. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain that as a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Twice during this debate my friend from Iowa [Mr. WELLER], who is a member of the Committee on Agriculture, has asked who is the author of this bill; and he has asked half a dozen other questions tending in that direction. The gentleman himself has been answered time and again during the discussion of this bill who was the author of it. But I desire to state for the benefit of some of the members of the House who were not in the last Congress that this bill, almost word for word, with scarcely a change by dotting an "i" or crossing a "t," except the third and fourth sections, came from the Committee on Agriculture and passed this House almost unanimously in the last session of the Forty-seventh Congress. The section under discussion and all the other sections, except the third and fourth, are exactly similar to the bill that passed the House last session. The third and fourth sections of the bill were presented in form to the Committee on Agriculture by a committee appointed by a convention held in the city of Chicago last fall, and composed of some of the most eminent gentlemen in the United States. They presented it at a meeting held here not only to the Department of Agriculture but they came before our committee, and after it had been discussed in that committee for days, the fullest consideration given to it, there being a difference of opinion among the members of the committee as to the importance of these two sections, it was adopted by a majority vote of that committee and ingrafted upon the bill just as it passed the last House. So that the bill we are considering, with the exception of the third section, the fourth having been stricken out of the bill by this committee, is identically the same bill as that which passed the House without a division in the last session of the last Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] to substitute the eighth section for the seventh.

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW].

Mr. MULDROW. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 8 and 9, section 7, strike out the words "any contagious or infectious or communicable disease, and especially the disease known as;" and, in lines 13 and 14, strike out "any contagious or infectious or communicable disease" and insert "pleuro-pneumonia;" and, in lines 18 and 19, strike out "any contagious or infectious or communicable disease, and especially the disease known as;" so that it will read:

"SEC. 7. That no railroad company within the United States whose road forms any part of a line of road from one State or Territory to another, or from a State into the District of Columbia, or the owners or masters of any steam or sailing or other vessel or boat, shall receive for transportation or transport from one State or Territory to another, or from any State into the District of Columbia, any live-stock affected with pleuro-pneumonia; nor shall any person, company, or corporation deliver for such transportation to any railroad company, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, any live-stock, knowing them to be affected with pleuro-pneumonia, nor shall any person, company, or corporation drive on foot or transport in private conveyance from one State or Territory to another, or from any State into the District of Columbia, any live-stock, knowing them to be affected with pleuro-pneumonia.

Mr. COOK. I move to strike out the last word.

For the last three or four days confined to my bed from sickness, I came here to-day when I ought to be at home in my bed. But I know the interest that is felt in this bill throughout the great Northwest by the cattle-producing people. And I want to say, especially to that side of the House, that from the organization of the House up to this time things have tended in an entirely satisfactory manner to a large part of the people of the Northwest. You have done that in my judgment which commends itself to the people of the Northwest and the growing sentiment there.

But I want to say if by amendment to this bill or on its final passage you do that which kills it or makes it inoperative, all you have done in the past and all you may do in this session of the House will go for naught among the class of people whom I represent and largely sympathize with in the Northwest, and the growing sentiment in your favor will be overcome and borne down by what you do against this bill, imperfect as it may be.

The bill is not as perfect as I would like to see it. It places power in the hands of a department of the Federal Government that may be dangerous. But in view of the danger which is threatening the cattle interests of this country I would rather trust the Agricultural Department with the dangerous power than to sit by and see the disease of pleuro-pneumonia spreading itself over the Northwest. And I want to say to you again, be careful what you do with this bill, for it is dear to the people of the whole West. And when we of the West have stood by you in the South upon the Mississippi River improvement when the question of constitutional power was raised against you, I ask that you do the same with us.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, I had the ability to speak more extendedly upon this bill, but to-day I can not. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The question being taken upon Mr. MULDROW'S proposed amendment, the Chair stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MULDROW. I ask for a division.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 124.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to amend the section by striking out all after the word "States," in line 2, down to and including the word "Columbia," in line 4. The words which I propose to strike out are these:

Whose road forms any part of a line of road from one State or Territory to another, or from a State into the District of Columbia.

The portion of the section which I propose to strike out proceeds upon the idea that we have the power to regulate railroads. We have no such power under the Constitution. We have the power to regulate the commerce over the railroads. And if you strike out those words you have all the purposes of the section left in constitutional form; that is, the section will then provide—

That no railroad company within the United States or the owners or masters of any steam or sailing or other vessel or boat shall receive for transportation or transport, &c.

Under the words I propose to strike out you will see that the New York Central, for instance, from New York to Buffalo, would not be within the provisions of the bill, because it lies wholly within the State of New York. The same may be said of the Erie road as extending between Erie and Philadelphia.

And, outside of examples of that description, it will be seen that if the words I have indicated shall be stricken out of this section you will then have a section covering the purpose of the committee, without any appearance of attempting to legislate upon a subject which is beyond the power of Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think this amendment should be adopted. I believe it is for the interest of the friends of the bill to adopt it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. I understand that we are now considering the seventh section of the bill. I move to insert after the word "Columbia," in line 7, the words "or from the District into any State."

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I am willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. REED. And I think the same words should be inserted after the word "Columbia," in line 17 of the section. If I am not mistaken in my examination of this section as it now stands there is in it no prohibition of the transportation of cattle from the District of Columbia.

The amendment of Mr. REED was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to notify in writing the proper officials or agents of any railroad, steamboat, or other transportation company doing business in or through any infected locality, and by publication in such newspapers as he may select, of the existence of said contagion; and any person or persons operating any such railroad, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, or owner or custodian of or person having control over such cattle or other live-stock within such infected district, who shall knowingly violate the provisions of section 7 of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

No amendment was offered.

The Clerk then read the following:

SEC. 9. That whenever any infectious or contagious disease affecting domestic animals, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia, shall be brought into or shall break out in the District of Columbia, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of said District to take measures to suppress the same promptly and to prevent the same from spreading; and for this purpose the said commissioners are hereby empowered to order and require that any premises, farm, or farms where such disease exists, or has existed, be put in quarantine; to order all or any animals coming into the District to be detained at any place or places for the purpose of inspection and examination; to prescribe regulations for and to require the destruction of animals affected with infectious or contagious disease, and for the proper disposition of their hides and carcasses; to prescribe regulations for disinfection, and such other regulations as they may deem necessary to prevent infection or contagion being communicated, and shall report to the Commissioner of Agriculture whatever they may do in pursuance of the provisions of this section.

The Committee on Agriculture recommend the following amendments:

In line 1, before the word "contagious," strike out the words "infectious or," and after the word "contagious" insert the words "infectious or communicable;" also, in line 14, strike out the words "infectious or," before the word "contagious," and in line 15 insert the words "infectious or communicable" before the word "disease."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BAYNE. I now move as an additional section, to come in after section 9, that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That whenever a State or Territory, in any section in which a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, fails to make adequate provisions for its extirpation, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

Mr. BAYNE. We now have an opportunity to pass a bill which will have some vitality and force, and which is demanded, as has been very clearly shown, by the agricultural industries of the country. It is perfectly evident that there is great unanimity in the Northwest in favor of this bill. Members of both political parties have supported it, with but perhaps one or two exceptions; and the one or two gentlemen who have opposed this bill do not claim to be opposed to a proper bill, but merely find fault with some provisions of this bill.

This bill seems to have been very maturely considered by the Committee on Agriculture. Its provisions appear to be very plain and simple. None of them seem to me to vest any power in the executive department of the Government which is not necessary for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the bill.

And it can now be seen by the votes which gentlemen may cast for or against this measure whether there is an honest, sincere sympathy with the agriculturists of the country, or whether all we have heard said by them in times past is mere buncombe, intended not to satisfy an actual demand and an actual want, but to satisfy perhaps some political exigency, to secure votes for different political parties or different political candidates.

We have now an opportunity of handing over to the agriculturists of the country a measure which they want and which they desire, one which will relieve them from great calamities from which they are unable by their own efforts to extricate themselves. I appeal to gentlemen who have expressed sympathy with the agricultural portions of this country to now cast their votes in favor of a provision which will measurably grant the relief which is asked, and to put aside constitutional objections or scruples and anything else that will stand in the way of a measure calculated to promote the public welfare and in which all parts of the country are interested.

I hope, therefore, that the section I have proposed will be adopted, because it will give effect and vitality to this bill. It places power in the hands of the executive department of the Government to do that which is required by this measure. It is not a mere promise or a mere pledge, as this bill would be without this power being lodged in the executive department of the Government. With this amendment the executive department will have the power to carry out the plain object and purpose of this bill.

I trust that every man who represents an agricultural industry, who has proclaimed himself a friend of the agricultural industries of the country, will vote for this amendment and make it a part of the bill.

Mr. HUNT. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUNT. My point of order is that the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] is simply one to reinstate section 4 of the bill, which has been stricken out by the vote of this committee. My point of order is that such a proposition is not in order.

Mr. BAYNE. The point of order is too late; the question has been debated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be inclined to hold that the point of order comes too late, as the proposition has already been debated.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I trust that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], who is a friend of this bill, will withdraw his amendment after the emphatic vote of the Committee of the Whole on two propositions in connection with what was the fourth section of the bill. We are now almost at the close of this bill.

Mr. BAYNE. Let us have a vote on my amendment. The bill will not be worth much without it.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Substantially the same vote can be had upon the proposition to strike out the fourth section. I have promised to ask for a vote in the House by yeas and nays upon that proposition, but I desire to say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] that I have been in most earnest and frequent conference with the friends of this bill both on this floor and outside of the House, by whom this matter of the fourth section has been under constant consideration, and I am not violating any courtesy due to the Commissioner of Agriculture or to the House in stating in general terms the belief of the Commissioner that, so cordial have been his relations with the States in every effort made by the Department to enforce the provisions of the existing law, there will be no necessity for the exercise by the President of the United States of this power with reference to any State, certainly not within the next twelve months or before we shall be again in session.

The pending amendment simply tends to revive a discussion upon the merits of a proposition which has already been decided by an emphatic majority. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from Pennsylvania will content himself with a yea-and-nay vote in the House on the fourth section and withdraw this amendment. It is nearly 4 o'clock, and to insist on the amendment will simply prolong discussion. I know that neither the gentleman from Kansas nor the gentleman from Pennsylvania will question my earnestness in this matter or doubt that I have done everything within my power to present that fourth section fairly to the House. I hope that in this critical moment the gentleman will withdraw the amendment and let us come to a vote.

Mr. RYAN. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill how he expects to protect the cattle of Missouri and Kansas from the disease which may be imparted by Texas cattle except by quarantining the State of Texas during a portion of the year?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Under the seventh and eighth sections of the bill, as now perfected, the Commissioner of Agriculture, whenever and wherever this disease may exist, can invoke the power of the law to punish any man who may transport from one State to another, or from any locality where they may be, cattle that have been branded by the Commissioner as affected with infectious or contagious disease.

Mr. RYAN. But while the Commissioner is prosecuting for a simple misdemeanor the man who drives a herd of diseased cattle into Missouri or Kansas, those cattle are spreading disease and death among the cattle of these two States.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to say to the gentleman from Missouri that my amendment, while nearly the same as the original fourth section, excludes the amendments which were attached to that section. I hope we shall have a square vote upon this proposition, which is intended simply to confer upon the Government the necessary power for the execution of this bill. I simply ask a vote. I believe everybody is ready to vote. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BAYNE, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 73, noes 131.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 10. That it shall be the duty of the several United States district attorneys to prosecute all violations of this act which shall be brought to their notice or knowledge by any person making the complaint; and the same shall be heard before any district or circuit court of the United States or Territorial court holden within the district in which the violation of this act has been committed or the person or corporation resides or carries on or has his or its place of business.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move to amend by inserting after the word "complaint," in the fourth line, the words "under oath."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out, at the close of the section, these words: "or the person or corporation resides or carries on or has his or its place of business."

Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, to the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read the next two sections, as follows:

SEC. 11. That the sum of $250,000, to be immediately available, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 12. That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall report annually to Congress, at the commencement of each session, a list of the names of all persons employed, an itemized statement of all expenditures under this act, and full particulars of the means adopted and carried into effect for the suppression of contagious diseases among domestic animals.

The following amendment reported from the Committee on Agriculture was read:

After the word "contagious," in line 6 of section 12, insert "infectious or communicable."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire to offer a substitute for the whole bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to move his amendment before the question is taken on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri. The substitute proposed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief thereof, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, and whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among them, and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country; and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose. The salary of the chief of said bureau shall be $3,000 per annum; and the Commissioner shall appoint a clerk for said bureau, with a salary of $1,500 per annum.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend the sum of $250,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary for the suppression and extirpation of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among domestic animals, said sum to be expended upon the requisition of the respective governors of the several States and Territories, or, if in the District of Columbia, upon requisition of the President of the United States: Provided, however, That no greater sum than $25,000 shall be expended in any one State or Territory: And provided further, That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be satisfied that the said diseases are prevalent in the State or Territory applying through its executive for such aid.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $250,000, to be immediately available, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the substitute.

Mr. TALBOTT demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 143.

Mr. TALBOTT called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, moved that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, demanded the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to enter a motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the pending bill, with the amendments of the committee, be printed in the RECORD to-morrow.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill and amendments are as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief thereof, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, and whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among them, and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country; and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose, not to exceed twenty persons at any one time. The salary of the chief of said bureau shall be $3,000 per annum; and the Commissioner shall appoint a clerk for said bureau, with a salary of $1,500 per annum.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint two competent agents, who shall be practical stock-raisers or experienced business men familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live-stock, whose duty it shall be, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases. The compensation of said agents shall be at the rate of $10 per diem, with all necessary expenses, while engaged in the actual performance of their duties under this act.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other [infectious or] contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, or such State or Territory shall have adopted plans and methods for the suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and such plans and methods shall be accepted by the Commissioner of Agriculture; and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious [or], infectious, or communicable disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, in paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to extirpate the disease: Provided, That the authorities of said State or Territory shall assume and pay one-half of the expense of the valuation of the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and one-half the cost of disinfection and necessary police regulations in the quarantine and care of infected herds of cattle.

SEC. 4. That whenever a State or Territory, in any section [of] in which [a contagious, or infectious, or communicable] pleuro-pneumonia disease exists [which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation], fails to make provisions for its extirpation, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district into any other State or Territory or foreign country: Provided, That no State or Territory, or part thereof, shall be declared in quarantine if the governor of the same shall officially certify to the President of the United States that he is satisfied from a thorough investigation that no such disease as aforesaid, dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, exists therein.

Afterward fourth section as amended was stricken out.

SEC. 5. That in order to promote the exportation of live-stock from the United States the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make special investigation as to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia, or any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, along the dividing lines between the United States and foreign countries, and along the lines of transportation from all parts of the United States to ports from which live-stock are exported, and make report of the results of such investigation to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, from time to time, establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live-stock as the results of said investigations may require.

SEC. 6. That to prevent the exportation from any port of the United States to any port in a foreign country of live-stock affected with any [infectious or] contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and especially pleuro-pneumonia, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to take such steps and adopt such measures, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as he may deem necessary.

SEC. 7. That no railroad company within the United States [whose road forms any part of a line of road from one State or Territory to another, or from a State into the District of Columbia], or the owners or masters of any steam or sailing or other vessel or boat, shall receive for transportation or transport, from one State or Territory to another, or from any State into the District of Columbia, or from the District into any State, any live-stock affected with any contagious [or], infectious, or communicable disease, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia; nor shall any person, company, or corporation deliver for such transportation to any railroad company, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, any live-stock, knowing them to be affected with any contagious [or], infectious, or communicable disease; nor shall any person, company, or corporation drive on foot or transport in private conveyance from one State or Territory to another, or from any State into the District of Columbia, or from the District into any State, any live-stock, knowing them to be affected with any contagious [or], infectious, or communicable disease, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia.

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to notify, in writing, the proper officials or agents of any railroad, steamboat, or other transportation company doing business in or through any infected locality, and by publication in such newspapers as he may select, of the existence of said contagion; and any person or persons operating any such railroad, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, or owner or custodian of or person having control over such cattle or other live-stock within such infected district, who shall knowingly violate the provisions of section 7 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 9. That whenever any [infectious or] contagious, infectious, or communicable disease affecting domestic animals, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia, shall be brought into or shall break out in the District of Columbia, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of said District to take measures to suppress the same promptly and to prevent the same from spreading; and for this purpose the said commissioners are hereby empowered to order and require that any premises, farm, or farms where such disease exists, or has existed, be put in quarantine; to order all or any animals coming into the District to be detained at any place or places for the purpose of inspection and examination; to prescribe regulations for, and to require the destruction of, animals affected with [infectious or] contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and for the proper disposition of their hides and carcasses; to prescribe regulations for disinfection, and such other regulations as they may deem necessary to prevent infection or contagion being communicated, and shall report to the Commissioner of Agriculture whatever they may do in pursuance of the provisions of this section.

SEC. 10. That it shall be the duty of the several United States district attorneys to prosecute all violations of this act which shall be brought to their notice or knowledge by any person making the complaint under oath; and the same shall be heard before any district or circuit court of the United States or Territorial court holden within the district in which the violation of this act has been committed [or the person or corporation resides or carries on or has his or its place of business].

SEC. 11. That the sum of $250,000, to be immediately available, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 12. That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall report annually to Congress, at the commencement of each session, a list of the names of all persons employed, an itemized statement of all expenditures under this act, and full particulars of the means adopted and carried into effect for the suppression of contagious, infectious, or communicable diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, Mr. CALKINS, Mr. BAYNE, and others demanded separate votes on Mr. EVERHART'S amendment, and on Mr. MULDROW'S amendment to the fourth section, and on the amendment to strike out the fourth section as amended.

Mr. BLAND. The fourth section has been stricken out, carrying the amendments to that section with it.

The SPEAKER. If the fourth section is stricken out, that will dispose of the other two amendments; but if it should not be, the question will recur on the two amendments on which separate votes are asked.

Mr. KASSON. All that is necessary is to reserve the right to a separate vote on those amendments.

The SPEAKER. That is all.

The amendments on which a separate vote was not asked were then concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on striking out the fourth section as amended.

Mr. CALKINS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REAGAN. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. VALENTINE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. The caucus of the Democratic party held a few evenings ago adjourned to meet in joint caucus with the Senate at 4 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. CALKINS. Then let us adjo[illegible]n.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered, this will come up to-morrow as the unfinished business immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. REAGAN's motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 28, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

VISITORS TO WEST POINT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, pursuant to section 1327 of the Revised Statutes, appointed Mr. CONGER and Mr. COKE members of the Board of Visitors on the part of the Senate to attend the annual examination of the cadets at the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Railroads, in answer to a resolution of the 4th instant calling for information as to whether the Union Pacific Railroad Company has issued any new stock or made any mortgage, pledge, lease, running arrangement, or other traffic contract since March 3, 1873; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, which has been transmitted to the Chair by the executive of that State. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, as follows:

Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for an increase of pensions in certain cases.

Whereas Federal soldiers and sailors of the late war who lost one eye in the service only receive a pension of $4 per month, which is unjust when compared with pensions allowed for other disabilities; and

Whereas a bill is now pending in the House of Representatives of the United States providing for the increase of such pensions from $4 to $18 per month: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and are hereby, requested to vote for such bill and said increase, and to use all honorable means to secure the passage thereof, and that the governor of Ohio be requested to forward copies of this resolution to the presiding officer of each House of Congress and to each of the Senators and Representatives from Ohio.

L. A. BRUNNER,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
ELMER WHITE,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Adopted February 21, 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents another joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, transmitted to the Chair by the executive of that State. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to urge the passage of a law for the equalization of bounties.

Whereas a great irregularity exists among the Union soldiers of the late war in the amount of bounties they received; and

Whereas the present condition of our revenues renders it easy for our Government to do justice by its brave defenders: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this General Assembly that Congress should at its earliest opportunity pass a law equalizing the bounties of Union soldiers.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to furnish each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of these resolutions.

L. A. BRUNNER,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
ELMER WHITE,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Adopted February 21, 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a communication from S. J. Carroll, secretary, of East Weymouth, Mass., transmitting a petition adopted by the "Boston preachers' meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church," praying that Congress carry out the recommendation regarding Mormonism contained in the President's last annual message to Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of H. O. Peabody and 27 other ex-Union soldiers, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 1) to amend section 2 of an act making appropriations for the payment of the arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present two petitions of a number of citizens residing in different parts of the State of Ohio, praying that certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States by which the constitutional term of many administrative offices was changed and fixed at four years be repealed, so that the incumbents of such offices may be immediately removed upon failure in the performance of their duty, and that when good they may continue in the discharge of those duties during good behavior and when bad that they may be removed at any time. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against the repeal of the act permitting vinegar-makers by a vaporizing process to separate alcoholic properties from the mash produced by them and to inject the same into water for the purpose of making vinegar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the petition of the Rt. Rev. Thomas M. Clark, R. G. Hazard, Horatio Rogers, and many other citizens of Providence, R. I., praying for the repeal of all duties on the importation of foreign books, periodicals, and newspapers. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of J. H. Pleasants and other citizens of Baltimore, Md., praying for the repeal of the act of May 15, 1820, and acts supplementary thereto, by which the constitutional term of many administrative offices was changed and fixed at four years; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of 763 citizens of Buffalo, N. Y., a petition of citizens of Albany, N. Y., and a petition of 500 citizens of Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for the repeal of the act of 1820, and the acts supplementary thereto, by which the terms of many administrative offices were changed and fixed at four years; which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. PENDLETON presented a petition of the soldiers at the Soldiers' Home, Dayton, Ohio, praying for the pensioning of soldiers who re-enlisted in the war of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present the petition of Charles R. Fessenden, late private Company D, Forty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and William Bell, jr., late private Company C, Seventy-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, praying for the passage of a law pensioning prisoners in the late war and for the equalization of bounties; which I move be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Ohio that such petitions have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the proper committee to consider them.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am very willing that the petition should go to that committee, although the first prayer of the petition is for pensions to those who were prisoners in the late war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not change the reference then, unless the Senator from Ohio desires it.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am willing it shall go to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is rather in the nature of a letter to me than a petition, but as it relates only to those subjects I asked leave to present it as a petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the petition will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present a petition of Thomas P. Morgan, of Washington, D. C., praying to be indemnified for certain losses which he alleges to have suffered in connection with the dredging of Norfolk harbor. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES presented a preamble and resolution adopted at a meeting of Wheeler Post, No. 98, Grand Army of the Republic, of Versailles, Ind., in favor of the passage of a bill for the equalization of bounties and other measures of relief; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of late officers of the volunteer army, praying for the passage of Senate bill 1306 and House bill 3485, fixing the rate of pension hereafter to be granted to all commissioned officers at one-half of the pay of the rank held by such officers at the time the disability was incurred; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of Van Buren Post, No. 105, Grand Army of the Republic of Indiana, Pike's Peak, Ind., in favor of the pensioning of ex-prisoners of the late war; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of William Ryan, of Washington, D. C., praying for a pension for disability incurred while a police officer of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of L. B. Bell and other citizens of the Cherokee Nation, praying for legislation in reference to the establishment of a national bank at Vinita, in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CALL. I present the petition of M. R. Marks and various other citizens of Hernando and Hillsborough Counties, Florida, praying for the building of a light-house on the key known as North Anclote Key, between Cedar Keys and Egmont, on the southern coast of Florida. The petition states that this coast is greatly in need of a light-house on North Anclote Key; that from Cedar Keys to Egmont, a distance of one hundred and forty miles, there is all along the coast a rapidly growing country and population; that it is a rock-bound coast, and there is no light-house between the two points, and that private means have been expended to build a pierhead, with a light-house thereon, at the mouth of Anclote River. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and I ask that the committee give special consideration to it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SABIN presented the petition of O. B. Gould, president of the Board of Trade of Winona, Minn., and others, praying for such needed appropriations for the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries as are recommended by the United States officers in charge; which was referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River.

He also presented a petition of the Good Templars of Minnesota, officially signed, representing 4,516 members, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SABIN presented memorials and joint resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A memorial to Congress, asking an appropriation for the construction of a light-house at Grand Marais, on Lake Superior.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, respectfully represent that the necessity for a harbor of refuge upon the north shore of Lake Superior has been heretofore recognized by your honorable body by appropriations which have been made for the partial improvement of such a harbor at Grand Marais; that the constantly increasing commerce of the lake demands that such improvements be pushed to early completion. Your memorialists therefore pray that such further and adequate appropriations may be promptly made as will insure a commodious harbor of refuge at Grand Marais, together with a light-house, without which the improvements already made will be of little value.

Memorial to Congress in relation to shear-booms at bridges on the Mississippi River.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota respectfully represents:

That the piers of many of the railway bridges crossing the Mississippi River are a very serious hinderance to navigation; that steamers frequently collide with them, and sometimes great loss of life is thereby occasioned, and that there is annually a great loss of property, and that they are constantly a great source of danger and dread to those who have business or who travel upon the river.

That, in accordance with the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, a board of United States engineers was convened in Saint Louis, and after an exhaustive examination of the subject they submitted a report to the honorable the Secretary of War, February 19, 1877, in which they recognized the great necessity for shear-booms, and recommended plans for the same at the various bridges.

That in 1882 Maj. A. Mackenzie, United States engineer in charge of the river improvements between Saint Anthony's Falls and the mouth of the Illinois River, constantly witnessing the great danger to life and property at the bridge piers and the consequent necessity for protection thereat, submitted a report to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, in which much important information was given upon the subject and the shear-booms urgently recommended. Therefore your memorialists would respectfully but urgently suggest that the interests of commerce, the security of property, and the safety of life imperatively demand that at the earliest possible moment shear-booms be placed at the various bridges, in substantial accordance with the plans and recommendations above alluded to.

Be it resolved (the assembly concurring), That the governor be, and he is hereby, requested to subscribe and forward the memorial to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

Joint resolution.

Resolved by the senate of the State of Minnesota (the house of representatives concurring), That whereas there is a large amount of travel and intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin carried on across the present bridge over the Saint Croix River at the dalles at Saint Croix and Taylor's Falls; and

Whereas the highway leading to said bridge on the Wisconsin side of the river runs over high and almost inaccessible hills, making extensive travel thereon exceedingly difficult and dangerous; and

Whereas it is of the highest importance that a bridge should be at once constructed across said river at a point higher up thereon, so as to be easily accessible from the Wisconsin side of said river, nearly opposite the village of Saint Croix Falls, avoiding saw-mills; and

Whereas the construction of said bridge would be a great accommodation to the people in said vicinity and the public at large: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use all reasonable efforts to secure an appropriation in the sum of $30,000, to be expended under the direction of the civil engineer of the United States, or in such other manner as Congress may direct, for the purpose of constructing said bridge.

SEC. 2. Resolved, That the governor be, and hereby is, repectfully requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Memorial to the House of Representatives.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, would respectfully but urgently represent:

That Big Stone Lake, which is but an enlargement of the Minnesota River, and Lake Traverse, but five miles distant therefrom, and which discharges its waters by the way of the Bois de Sioux River into the Red River of the North at Breckenridge, are each about thirty-five miles long, with a width of from one and a half to two miles, and so situated in the great valley which extends from the northern boundary of the State to the mouth of the Minnesota River that by embracing them in the "reservoir system" now being prosecuted by the Government in this State the excess of waters caused by the annual and disastrous spring floods in that region could be permanently restrained and so utilized as to render the Minnesota River navigable throughout its length, and also extend the navigation of the Red River of the North southward about one hundred miles to the foot of said Big Stone Lake.

That the preliminary surveys have shown the entire practicability of the project above foreshadowed, and at a comparatively small cost, while its immense advantages to the people of Western Minnesota and Eastern Dakota are too obvious to need repetition.

Wherefore, your memorialists respectfully urge upon Congress that you take such speedy and prompt action as will result in accomplishing the objects herein set forth.

L. FLETCHER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
C. A. GILMAN,
President of the Senate.

A memorial to the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, respectfully represent that further and more liberal appropriations are urgently demanded for the immediate improvement of the harbor of Duluth.

The expansion of the commerce tributary to that point has been so manifestly and largely out of proportion to the extension of harbor facilities; that a further failure to augment the appropriations must result in the obstruction of such commerce or its diversion to unnatural and less economical channels.

The water front in said harbor, so improved as to be presently available for commerce, is not at all commensurate to the variety and magnitude of the shipping interests which are now definitely seeking accommodation at that port.

Wherefore your memorialists pray for an immediate and substantial increase of the appropriations for that harbor.

President of the Senate.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Joint resolution instructing our Senators and requesting our Representatives in Congress to use their best endeavors to secure such appropriations as may be necessary to carry on the improvements of the Mississippi River.

Whereas the importance of continuing the work of the improvement of the Mississippi River in the interest of cheap transportation is a matter of national interest: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

SEC. 1. That our Senators in Congress be, and they are hereby, instructed, and our Representatives be, and they are hereby, requested, to use their best endeavors to secure such appropriations as may be necessary to carry on the improvement of the Mississippi River.

Mr. SABIN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A joint resolution for the relief of John Fenske.

Whereas John Fenske, of the city of New Ulm, in the county of Brown, and State of Minnesota, on the 18th day of August, A. D. 1862, while in the employment of the United States as a mechanic and while endeavoring to save the property of the Government from destruction, received a severe wound from Sioux Indians, whereby he was permanently disabled; and

Whereas a bill has been introduced in the Congress of the United States providing that the name of said John Fenske be placed on the roll of invalid pensioners: Therefore,

Mr. SABIN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A joint resolution asking immediate adjustment of land grants to railroads in this State.

Whereas millions of acres of land in this State have been granted to railroads and have been withdrawn from settlement and are untaxed; and

Whereas many of such grants have not been adjusted, and lands not falling within the grant are thus withheld from market or are untaxed; and

Whereas some of such grants have been forfeited by reason of non-compliance in part of the railroad company to which the grant has been made with intentions of the grant; and

Whereas it requires an act of Congress or the decree of a court to forfeit the land of a defaulting railroad company: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, That the interest of the State and of the citizens requires that all land grants to railroads should be adjusted at the earliest possible day, or that in all cases when any railroad company has not complied with the conditions of the grant to it such grant should be at once declared forfeited.

Resolved further, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are requested to use all honorable means to secure an immediate adjustment of such grants, or an immediate forfeiture of any grant the terms of which has not been complied with.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state be, and is hereby, requested to forward a copy of this resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress at as early a day as practicable.

FRED. VON BAUMBACH,

Mr. SABIN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A memorial to the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled.

Your memorialists, the senate and house of representatives of the State of Minnesota, most respectfully represent that whereas under and by the laws of the State of Minnesota a judgment is a lien on real estate only upon and after the docketing of such judgment in the county in which such real estate lies; and

Whereas the courts of the United States in this State have held that the aforesaid provision of law is inapplicable to judgments rendered by the United States courts, and that such judgment, when docketed in the office of the clerk of such courts, becomes a lien on all real estate in any and every county in the State without the docketing of such judgments in the county in which such real estate lies; and

Whereas the existence of different rules in the same State as to the liens of judgments is misleading to the public; and the making of a judgment a lien on any real estate in any county in which such judgment is not docketed is a great and manifest hardship and inconvenience: Therefore your memorialists respectfully and earnestly pray that a law be enacted by Congress making the laws of the United States conform to the laws of the State in the respect aforesaid.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to use their influence to secure the passage of such a law.

Resolved further, The secretary of state is hereby directed to send an authenticated copy of this memorial to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

C. A. GILMAN,
President of the Senate.

L. FLETCHER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved March 3, A. D. 1883.

Mr. GROOME presented the petition of Harvey Stanley and others, legal representatives of owners of vessels destroyed by the French, praying legislation for the payment of the French spoliation claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of Samuel Hatfield, of Simpson County, Kentucky, praying compensation for property taken from him by the United States Army during the war of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RANSOM, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1251) to authorize the purchase of a wharf for the use of the Government in Wilmington, N. C., reported it without amendment.

FRANK GALT.

Mr. PIKE. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 186) for the relief of Frank Galt, to report it without amendment; and I ask that the joint resolution be put on its passage at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Frank Galt the sum of $492, for services rendered as assistant to the Journal Clerk of the House of Representatives from December 3, 1883, to February 23, 1884, inclusive, being at the rate of $6 per diem.

Mr. HALE. What is the provision of the joint resolution as to the fund from which the payment shall be made?

Mr. PIKE. From money in the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is to be paid "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. HALE. How does the joint resolution come here?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a joint resolution of the House of Representatives, which was received yesterday, referred to the Committee on Claims, and now reported favorably by that committee. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. HALE. I had the impression that it provided that the money be paid from the contingent fund of the House, with which, I think, we have little or nothing to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution does not so provide.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS. I introduce a bill. Being brief, I ask that it may be read once at length.

The bill (S. 1670) to relieve the members and judge-advocate of the general court-martial for the trial of Fitz-John Porter from the operation of certain restrictions of the eighty-fourth article of war was read the first time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the members and judge-advocate of the general court-martial which convened in the city of Washington, D. C., in obedience to special order No. 362, of November 25, 1862, from the headquarters of the Army, for the trial of Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, United States volunteers, be, and are hereby, relieved from the operation of so much of the eighty-fourth article of war as relates to disclosing and discovering the vote or opinion of any particular member of the said court-martial.

The bill was read the second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1671) for the judicial ascertainment of the facts in private claims, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1672) to declare the true intent and meaning of the act of June 17, 1870, chapter 30; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAMS introduced a bill (S. 1673) to regulate the retiring of Army officers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1674) granting an increase of pension to Jacob Miller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1675) to equalize the rank and pay of certain staff officers of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1676) granting a pension to John F. Hinman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1677) to amend section 1207 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and to provide for the examination of officers of artillery before promotion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CALL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1678) for the relief of persons whose property has been confiscated under the act of Congress entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PENDLETON introduced a bill (S. 1679) to facilitate the settlement and develop the resources of the Territory of Alaska and to open an overland communication therewith; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PENDLETON. I introduce this bill by request, without being responsible for its contents. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1680) granting a pension to George Prince; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LAMAR introduced a bill (S. 1681) for the relief of Mrs. Mary Jane Veazie; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

RAILROAD IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Senate will now proceed under the eighth rule to the consideration of bills on the Calendar, beginning with Order of Business No. 122, being Senate bill No. 50.

Mr. HALE. I am very desirous that the Senate should finish the consideration of the naval bill to-day, and I am informed that we are likely to be interrupted at an early hour this afternoon by resolutions that will come in from the other House that will need to be immediately considered.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will permit me a moment, I will state that he is misinformed on that subject.

Mr. HALE. Is it not to be to-day?

Mr. INGALLS. The resolutions will not be here this afternoon.

Mr. HALE. I was told a little while ago that the resolutions would come over to-day. As I was misinformed I shall not ask for the present consideration of the naval bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. 50) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The bill has been read and the pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. HARRISON. Since the adjournment yesterday, I have taken some pains to examine the pending bill, and the result of that examination has been to satisfy me that it ought not to be considered under Rule VIII, the five-minute rule. I think, therefore, without attempting to give my reasons, as they are not important to any one, I shall interpose the objection and let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to and goes over.

Mr. BROWN. The order of the Senate yesterday was that the substitute reported by the Committee on Railroads should be printed and laid on the tables of Senators this morning. By some sort of neglect the printed copies have not reached our tables, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers were sent to the Printing Office to be printed in the regular time and order, and undoubtedly they will soon be received and laid upon the desks of Senators.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the Senator from Indiana not to interpose any objection in the way of the bill retaining its position at the head of the Calendar of unobjected cases until to-morrow morning, and then determine whether to make his objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana has already objected.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it is scarcely worth while that we should occupy time upon the subject to-morrow morning. I am satisfied that the bill can not be considered under the five-minute rule. I am not willing that it shall be so considered, and that my participation in any discussion in regard to it shall be limited to five minutes and to one speech. If the report of the committee is not very widely different from the original bill which was introduced, I think there are most serious objections to its passage.

Mr. BROWN. I will state to the Senator that there have been very important amendments made in the substitute reported by the committee. I would prefer that the Senator should see that before he determines the question, and that is one reason why I asked him not to interpose an imperative objection this morning.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to the bill going over if the Senator thinks it will be any advantage, but I think I may say to him now that the objection will probably be made to-morrow as it has been to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana withdraw his objection?

Mr. HARRISON. I will withdraw the objection at the request of the Senator from Georgia, and let the bill occupy to-morrow the same place it did this morning.

Mr. BROWN. That is all we ask at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that upon objection being made no debate is in order, but it has been the custom to hear explanations. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over, retaining its place at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

BONDS OF EXECUTORS.

The bill (S. 310) to amend the laws relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that whenever a testator shall, by last will and testament, request that his executor or executors be not required to give bond for the performance of his or their duty as such executor or executors, the bond required of such executor or executors shall be in such penalty as the court or the register of wills shall consider sufficient to secure the payment of the debts due by the testator and all public taxes or assessments due or to become due on the property devised or bequeathed, and the bond shall be conditioned accordingly, and shall be in no other or greater penalty. But whenever any distributee, legatee, or devisee named in a will shall make it appear to the court that any executor who has given such bond as is thus provided for is wasting the assets of the estate, or that the assets in the hands of such executor are in danger of being lost, wasted, or misappropriated, then the court shall require the executor to give bond, with security, in penalty sufficient to secure the interests of such distributees, legatees, or devisees, and conditioned accordingly; and on his failure to give bond as required by the court within a time named by the court, his letters testamentary shall be revoked forthwith.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM J. GAMBLE.

The bill (S. 436) for the relief of William J. Gamble was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William J. Gamble, late of Company K, Second Arkansas Cavalry, $125, in payment for the running-gear of a six-horse wagon furnished by him and used by the United States Army.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. KENNA January 31, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 436) for the relief of William J. Gamble, respectfully report that a similar bill was introduced in the Senate in the Forty-sixth Congress, and referred to the Committee on Claims, which reported to the Senate thereon. The matter occupies now the same status it occupied then. The papers, vouchers, and evidence are the same. This committee, therefore, upon consideration of the claim, adopt the report made by the Committee on Claims of the Forty-sixth Congress. That report is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1063) for the relief of William J. Gamble, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully submit the following report:

The claim embraced in the bill is for the value of the running-gear of a six-horse wagon taken for the use of the United States Army from the claimant. The following is a copy of the original voucher given to the claimant for the property taken, and which is before your committee in support of the claim:

LA GRANGE, TENN., August 11, 1865.

This is to certify that the running-gear of a six-horse wagon belonging to W. J. Gamble, private of Second Arkansas Cavalry, was taken to replace the running-gear of one Government wagon broken down, unable to travel. Said Government wagon was in the possession of Capt. R. B. Owens. A. Q. M., Springfield, Mo., on the march from Northeast Arkansas to Springfield, Mo., under the command of Col. J. E. Phelps, Second Arkansas Cavalry.

GEO. MORLEY,
Lieutenant, Regimental Quartermaster, Second Arkansas Cavalry.

Witness to the above:
JOHN E. PHELPS,
Colonel Second Arkansas Cavalry.

This claim was presented to the Third Auditor of the Treasury in October, 1874, and the foregoing voucher filed with that officer, also an affidavit of the claimant in support of his claim. The original voucher was referred by the Third Auditor to the Second Auditor of the Treasury for his examination to test the genuineness of the signatures by which the vouchers are certified and approved. On the 12th of April, 1875, the Second Auditor returned the voucher, stating that from evidence on file in his office the signatures of John E. Phelps, colonel, and George Morley, lieutenant and regimental quartermaster, Second Arkansas Cavalry, in case of W. J. Gamble, private Second Arkansas Cavalry, may be considered genuine.

The affidavit of the claimant Gamble, made before J. M. Doubleday, notary public, at Boone County, Arkansas, states, among other things, that he was the original and is the present owner of said claim; that said wagon was taken about the 25th of May, 1864, from his farm in Carroll County, in the State of Arkansas. It was a new six-horse wagon and in good running order, and was well worth $125; that he had given that price for it but a short time before it was taken; the wagon had not been used more than one month.

On reference of the claim to the Quartermaster-General it was considered that $100 is a fair value of the property.

The claim, however, was disallowed by the Second Comptroller on the ground that the voucher was not a regular voucher, but only a memorandum receipt, and should have been presented under the act of July 4, 1864.

The claim was then presented under the act of July 4, 1864, and it was determined by the Quartermaster-General that, the case having originated in an insurrectionary State, Arkansas, he had no jurisdiction of the claim.

Whether the claim could have been allowed by either of the officers to whom the claim has been presented it is not necessary now to inquire. It is clearly established that the wagon was the property of the claimant, Gamble, and was on his farm in Arkansas; he was loyal to the United States; was in its military service as a private soldier in the Second Arkansas Cavalry; and the article was taken by command of the colonel of the Second Arkansas Cavalry and used by that regiment. The value of the property is $125.

The committee are of opinion that the claim should be allowed, and report the bill back and recommend that it be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID WALDO.

The bill (S. 388) for the relief of David Waldo was announced as next in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that go over. There is an adverse report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The bill will go over.

COMMON SCHOOLS.

The bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools was announced as next in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. That bill will occupy more time than can be given it under the five-minute rule, and I ask that it be made the special order for March 12, subject to the existing special order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the bill now reached upon the Calendar be made the special order for March 12, at 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. I call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] to the request. I think he had a bill set for that same day.

Mr. BLAIR. I said "subject to the existing special order."

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools be made the special order for March 12, subject to the existing special order. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. That order will be made.

ARMY DETAILS.

The bill (S. 641) concerning details from the Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think that bill can safely be——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has called for the reading of the report.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator from Tennessee will yield for a moment, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] is in charge of this bill, and I will ask him if he has any objection to letting it lie over until we can have it considered further in committee.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey before it goes over if the committee has considered the propriety of excepting from the provisions of the bill the officer who happens to be in charge of War Records.

Mr. SEWELL. I will state to the Senator from Tennessee that the President, under the bill as amended by the committee, will have power to make the exception by his order. I have no objection to the bill going over if the Senator from Illinois desires it.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not believe that there can be a particle of objection to this bill from any source whatever, as it has been amended by the committee. It permits the President to detail whomsoever he pleases and so long as he pleases, but cuts off details by inferior authority.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill as read I think does not contain such a provision. I suppose that only the original bill was read, independent of the amendment recommended by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, asks that the bill may go over to be further considered by that committee.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state that the question is not as to the provision in reference to the details. It is only a question in the minds of some in reference to whether this power should be taken from the General of the Army and transferred to the President, or whether it should reside as now in the General of the Army. That is the only point on which I ask that the bill may be passed over until we have a meeting of the committee to-morrow.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to the bill going over.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the only point about it, so far as the bill is concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not propose to interpose an objection. I have no objection to the bill standing at the head of the Calendar for to-morrow. In the mean time the amendment proposed by the committee can be looked at.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will then go over without prejudice and stand at the head of the Calendar of unobjected cases.

FREDERICK W. RUGGLES.

The bill (S. 743) for the relief of Frederick W. Ruggles, of Westport, Nova Scotia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to refer to the Court of Claims for hearing and adjudication the claim of Frederick W. Ruggles for losses and damages suffered by him as owner of the cargo and charterer of the schooner Argonaut, in the year 1861, by reason of the seizure and detention of that vessel by the officials of the United States.

Mr. CONGER and Mr. GARLAND. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, January 31, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 743) for the relief of Frederick W. Ruggles, having considered the case and the evidence presented, beg leave to report:

The claim of Frederick W. Ruggles against the United States, which he desires to be heard and adjudicated upon in the Court of Claims, is based upon the following facts:

The said claimant, Frederick W. Ruggles, is a subject of the British Government, residing at Westport, in the county of Digby, Province of Nova Scotia, and Dominion of Canada, and was the owner of a cargo consisting of six hundred and thirty-eight barrels of No. 1 herring, seventy-five quintals of dry codfish, and other goods and articles, which said cargo was shipped on board the schooner Argonaut on or about the 23d day of August, A. D. 1861. Said schooner cleared from Westport aforesaid for Key West, in Florida, on the 27th day of August, A. D. 1861, and while on her voyage to such port, and on or about the 13th day of September, A. D. 1861, was captured by the United States steamer Susquehanna off Hatteras Inlet, sent with said cargo into New York in charge of a prize-crew, and was libeled by the United States attorney as a prize of war. The said claimant appeared before the district court of the United States sitting as a prize-court, and obtained from said court a judgment in his favor, which judgment was for the return of the cargo to him, without costs against the naval captors. But an interval of six weeks having occurred from the time of the capture to the date of such release and restoration, during which time said cargo was in the hands and under the control of the captors, the fish and other perishable articles were damaged and rendered almost worthless, and many articles forming a part of said cargo were removed and have not since been seen by said claimant.

Subsequently, in the year 1872, the said claimant presented his case, by his own Government, upon memorial, to the commissioner appointed under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, called and known as the "Washington treaty," which commission is known as the "British and American Mixed Commission," and established his claim, as it seems to your committee, by good and competent evidence, all of which evidence, with the memorial, demurrer, and arguments, may be found in the Reports of said British and American Mixed Commission, Volumes X, XVII, XXVI, now on file in the library of the Department of State.

From an examination of the case, as found in said reports, it appears that while the whole case was presented, with evidence as to its merits, in the hearings before said commission, the merits were not considered. The United States, by their counsel, demurred to the memorial of the claimant as not showing a case within the jurisdiction of said commission, and specified as grounds of demurrer—

First. That the said cargo having been discharged by the judgment of the district court, and no appeal taken from such judgment, the United States are not responsible for the acts of the said United States steamer Susquehanna, and are not liable to reclamation for damages thereof;

Second. That the question of costs and damages in regard to said alleged capture having been within the jurisdiction of said district court to determine, and the said court not having awarded damages to said claimant for such detention, and no appeal having been taken from the judgment of said court in that regard, no reclamation lies before this commission in behalf of the claimant for the damages claimed in said memorial; and Third. That the memorial sets forth no facts or circumstances establishing a claim against the United States within the provisions of the twelfth article of said treaty.

The question of jurisdiction was argued at length, and an examination of the case in the reports shows that it was the only question argued and considered, and that consequently upon that ground the claim was disallowed by the commission. It was held that until the claimant had exhausted his remedy by appeal, and finds himself still aggrieved by the judicial tribunal of last resort, he has no ground of reclamation against the United States as the worker of injustice against him. It is only in the event of final failure of justice, after pursuit of all the regular and ordinary means of redress, that any nation is to be considered as working wrong against a foreign litigant, so as to entitle him to reclamation through the intervention of his own government. The litigant who stops short of this can not avail himself of the provisions of the treaty.

In the case before the commission, the claimant files an affidavit setting forth the reasons why no appeal was taken from the decision of this prize court, which are, substantially, that the counsel who conducted the business for said claimant informed him that there was no necessity for taking such an appeal, unless he, the said claimant, intended to commence suit in a civil court for damages; and that the said counsel gave it as his opinion that there would, without doubt, be other such claims arising in the course of the war which would be referred to arbitration, and that, being governed by such advice, no appeal was taken. Such right of appeal having now been lost by limitation, and the claimant having presented a claim which is prima facie a just one, it seems to your committee, in accordance with the principles of justice and equity, that the claimant should have the opportunity of presenting this case in the Court of Claims, that it may be heard upon its merits and judgment given accordingly.

Wherefore your committee report back the bill and recommend that it do pass.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the latter part of the bill be read again.

The Chief Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. CONGER. This is a claim of long standing which has been before Congress in many forms for the last ten years.

Mr. PIKE. Let me say to the Senator that this bill was reported by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] who is away. If the Senator is willing I should like to have it passed by so as to keep its place until he returns. He is expected back in a few days.

Mr. CONGER. I rose to state the nature of this claim and the length of time this fish case has been pending. This is really a bill to secure payment for damage to fish. I was about to object to the consideration of the bill; I do object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan objects to the consideration of the bill, and it goes over.

ELIZA HOWARD POWERS.

The bill (S. 716) for the relief of Eliza Howard Powers was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Eliza Howard Powers of $2,500.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MANDERSON January 31, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 716) for the relief of Eliza Howard Powers, report:

This case has been pending before the Congress of the United States since the second session of the Forty-third Congress, and has received at the hands of different committees of both Houses frequent favorable action, as will appear in the report of Mr. FRYE, herewith submitted.

At the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress the Committee on Claims of the Senate made the following report, No. 893, which report so clearly sets forth the facts that it is adopted by this committee:

"Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report, to accompany bill S. 1500:

"'The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1500) for the relief of Eliza Howard Powers, report:

"The case finds that at the breaking out of the civil war Mrs. Powers was a widow woman, of fine education, of excellent family, and in good circumstances, a resident of the city of Paterson, in the State of New Jersey; that from April 28, 1861, to August 14, 1864, she devoted her whole time, energy, influence, and means to the service of Union soldiers and for the success of the Union cause—caring for the sick and wounded soldiers, collecting and forwarding hospital supplies and money for their relief, ministering to their wants, and relieving their sufferings in camp, field, and hospital; that during this whole time she acted as president of the Florence Nightingale Relief Association, of Paterson, N. J., and from November, 1862, to August, 1864, acted also as associate manager of the United States sanitary commission for New Jersey, and in this capacity collected over $8,000 in money, and over 20,000 articles for hospital use; that she received no pay or compensation whatsoever, paying out of her own means the cost of her own transportation and subsistence, besides contributing freely to the purposes she served to the amount at least of $2,500; that in October, 1864, she lost by misfortune her whole property, and for over a year was seriously and dangerously sick from disease contracted by her exertions and exposure in the performance of her duties; that in 1867, without doubt in consideration of her labor of love, she was appointed to a clerkship in the dead-letter office, which position she held until September, 1874, since which time she has been largely dependent upon her widowed daughter, also poor. Your committee find, in partial support of these facts, the statements of the following letter from Henry W. Bellows, president of the United States sanitary commission:

NEW YORK, February 22, 1876.

SIR: I beg to ask your personal attention to the claims of Mrs. Eliza H. Powers, of New Jersey, to some place in the gift of the Government. During our late unhappy but glorious war Mrs. Powers, then in comfortable circumstances, raised, by her indefatigable exertions, $10,000 and 20,000 articles of clothing for the relief of our sick and wounded soldiers. She wore out her health in the unpaid service then rendered to the country. A woman of education, a lady in breeding and of unimpeached character, she is reduced to poverty by misfortune, and has to earn her daily bread, at 73 years of age, by her personal labor. If such a patriotic and venerable woman has not claims to a clerkship, which her superior knowledge, accomplishment in languages, and extraordinary energy fit her to occupy with advantage to the Government, who can have a claim worthy the attention of the Government or its Chief Magistrate? As I had charge of the sanitary commission during the war, I was a special witness of Mrs. Powers's sacrifice and advantageous labors for our soldiers. I have felt specially called to testify in her case, and have felt that her age made it not improper to bring the subject directly to the President's notice.

Respectfully, your fellow-citizen,

HENRY W. BELLOWS,
President United States Sanitary Commission.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

"There are also letters, petitions, and statements of facts signed by Hon. S. Tuttle, ex-mayor of Paterson, N. J.; Garret A. Hobart, speaker of the New Jersey assembly; George Wirtz, editor of the Press; John J. Brown, president First National Bank of Paterson; B. Buckley, president Second National Bank; Nathaniel Townsend, mayor of Paterson; H. A. Williams, ex-mayor of Paterson; Benj. Buckley, president New Jersey senate, and many others of high character and prominent positions.

"Your committee also cite the following extract from the letter of John W. Wallace, reporter of the United States Supreme Court:

"'I can think of no case more affecting than hers [meaning Mrs. Powers's]. Her family, in a branch of it known to me, is one of the best in this part of our country. She has been uncommonly well educated in letters, and, but for accident—such as occasionally happens in social life—would have been in a situation of opulence. She is, however, in circumstances very painfully the reverse. She has claims also upon the nation. She was for three years, as I understood at the time and have no doubt, engaged in our camps and hospitals during the war, and did much to relieve the sufferings of our sick and wounded soldiers. As an associate manager for New Jersey of the United States sanitary commission, it has been stated to me, and I doubt not truly, that she raised by personal application in one city $10,000 in money, besides superintending the preparation of 21,000 hospital articles, which went to the use of the Army. Her own health was impaired by her labor.'

"Mrs. Powers is now 80 years of age. The history of the case in Congress shows that her petition was first presented to Congress at the second session of the Forty-third Congress, and received a favorable report from the Committee on Claims of the House, on which there was no final action. Again, in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, no action. In the United States Senate, in the Forty-sixth Congress, referred to the Committee on Claims, whose report was adverse. The report of that committee was submitted by Senator Harris, and the facts found were substantially as those stated in this report, but its conclusion was in these words:

"'The services of the petitioner were patriotic and laudable, but such as many thousands of the ladies of the country performed, prompted by similar motives, and such as very few have demanded compensation for, and the Government has not heretofore recognized as justifying a demand upon the Treasury. * * * The committee recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed.'

"Your committee, on the contrary, find that such services have heretofore been recognized by Congress, as appears by a resolution appropriating $15,000 as compensation to Miss Clara Barton for money expended by her from her own resources during the war of the rebellion in endeavoring to discover missing soldiers of the armies of the United States and in communicating intelligence to their relatives, which resolution passed Congress and was approved March 10, 1866; also by an act passed in 1876 appropriating $20,000 to Mrs. Eliza Potter, widow of Lorenzo T. Potter, deceased, late of Charleston, S. C.; also by every act of Congress since the war by which pensions have been increased beyond the provisions of law, particularly in those cases where large annuities have been paid to widows of prominent officers in the Army; also in the ample provisions which have been made by law for the widows of deceased Presidents of the United States. Your committee do not believe that in making an appropriation for Mrs. Powers any new or dangerous precedent will be established. On the contrary, in their opinion it is the duty of a great government like this to deal justly with its citizens. Mrs. Powers can not be compensated for the invaluable services she rendered to the sick and wounded soldiers, but she can, and in the opinion of your committee ought to, be reimbursed, under all the circumstances of this case, for the $2,500 she actually expended. Therefore your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying Senate bill, amended by striking out 'five thousand,' in lines 4 and 5, and inserting the words 'twenty-five hundred.'"

Your committee, agreeing fully with the statements of fact and the conclusions in the above report, recommend the passage of the bill S. 716.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know how this claim found its way back to the Committee on Claims and from there to the Senate. Some three or four years ago I had occasion carefully to examine the claim and all the evidence that had then been filed. I found in it only an appeal to the sympathy of Congress, and what seemed to me surely a request for a gratuity. I thought then as I think now——

Mr. PIKE. Allow me to suggest that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] who had the investigation of this case and made the report is unfortunately unwell, and I desire that the bill go by, not losing its place, until he returns to his seat.

Mr. HARRIS. I am perfectly willing it shall take its place, under the eighth rule, on the Calendar, to remain until the Senator who reported it can be here.

Mr. McPHERSON. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw his request, because certainly nothing more can be said and nothing more need be said than is found in the report submitted to us and read by the Secretary. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw his request for the postponement of the bill. I think the Senate are sufficiently advised upon this question. It has been twice before the Senate, I think. On one occasion it received favorable consideration by the Senate——

Mr. COCKRELL. Never.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then it ought to have received favorable consideration. If there is any case that stands out singly and alone as one deserving of recognition by the Government of the United States, this case occupies that position. An old lady, now eighty years of age, without kin, with nobody to care for her, spent the best part of her life, exhausted her energies, destroyed her health, spent her money in works of charity, and at a time when the Government needed the services of women like her. She may well be called the Florence Nightingale of this country. No person during the civil war, from the commencement to the end of it, ever did so much in proportion to her ability as did Mrs. Powers; and for the Senate of the United States to withhold from that poor old lady, with one foot, and more than one foot, in the grave, the return of the money she expended (to say nothing of the services she rendered to the Government during that trying time) is to my mind a very hard proceeding indeed.

We grant pensions here day after day to people many of whom, in my opinion and I think in the opinion of many other Senators, are perhaps not justly and fairly entitled to them except that the law gives them. Now we propose to make a law that will give back to this old lady the money that she expended at a time when she felt more able to do it, for certainly now she has nothing. But receiving as we did all her energies, all her efforts, exhausting her health, exhausting her means, we ought now, when she comes to Congress and simply asks a return of the money she expended, be prompt in acceding to her request.

Mr. PIKE. I withdraw my request for a postponement.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from New Hampshire interrupted me to make a request which was that this bill should go over until the Senator who reported it could be in his seat. I have but a single word more, however, to submit.

I think there is very little doubt that the Senate will pass this bill, and I simply want to place my protest on the record, accompanied with the assertion that it opens a door and sets a precedent which, if followed in respect to all other persons of the same class and who performed similar services, you may prepare yourselves for the appropriation of millions of money, for I undertake to say from a careful examination of this case that there are not less than twenty to forty thousand ladies in the United States who performed services just as important, just as patriotic, and precisely of the same character; and if this bill is passed it will open the door and invite them, and I doubt not they will come, and it will cost millions upon millions of dollars.

Mr. PIKE. I think the Senator from Tennessee misapprehends one point. This bill does not propose to pay for the lady's services. It only provides for paying a portion of the money she actually expended for the benefit of the Government. When he states that it will open the door and establish a bad precedent, let me say that the precedent is already established by three or four cases recited in the report, especially the case of Miss Clara Barton and the case of Mrs. Eliza Potter, who were paid for precisely the same kind of expenditures. I certainly hope the bill will pass.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator think the precedent worthy of being followed?

Mr. PIKE. I think a good one is.

Mr. HARRIS. Do you think it a good precedent?

Mr. PIKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. It must be extended, then, to every lady who occupied the same position and performed similar services.

Mr. McPHERSON rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey has once addressed the Senate upon this subject. Under the eighth rule he is not in order.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may proceed.

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not care to say anything further.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the reading of the report which was made by the Committee on Claims of the Forty-sixth Congress in this case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HARRIS February 4, 1880:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred Senate bill 532, accompanied by the petition and papers of Eliza Howard Powers, asking compensation for certain services alleged to have been rendered during the war, submit the following report:

In 1861, at the beginning of the war, petitioner was a citizen of Paterson, N. J., and the petition states "that from April 28, 1861, to August 14, 1864, she devoted her whole time, energy, influence, and means to the service and for the success of the Union cause; caring for the sick and wounded soldiers, collecting and forwarding hospital supplies and money for their relief, ministering to their wants, and relieving their sufferings in camp, field, and hospital."

That during this period she acted as president of the Florence Nightingale Relief Association of Paterson, N. J.

With this petition there are a number of letters from officials of New Jersey and other respectable persons, which state that the petitioner was for three or four years during the war earnest, energetic, and active in her attentions to the sick and wounded soldiers of the Federal Army, and in her efforts to raise, and that she did raise, by the voluntary contribution of citizens $8,000 or $10,000 in money and many articles for the use of hospitals, &c., which she forwarded to the Army.

These facts are stated in letters recommending the petitioner for appointment, and as reasons why she should be appointed, to a clerkship in some one of the Departments of the Government.

The petitioner was appointed to a clerkship in the dead-letter office of the Post-Office Department, which position she held for about seven years, when for some reason which does not appear in the papers, and into which the committee has not inquired, she was discharged.

After which, on the 16th March, 1876, this petition was presented in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions, and on April 13, 1876, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from further consideration and the petition referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; but no report was made upon it. It was again presented in the Senate of the Forty-fifth Congress on the 14th May, 1878, and referred to the Committee of Claims, and on the 4th of June, 1878, a verbal adverse report was made by the committee, and on the 14th June, 1878, the bill for the relief of this petitioner was indefinitely postponed, and without additional testimony the bill under consideration was introduced in the Senate of the Forty-sixth Congress on 30th April, 1879, the papers withdrawn from the files and referred to your committee.

The services of the petitioner were patriotic and laudable, but such as many thousands of the ladies of the country performed, prompted by similar motives, and such as very few have demanded compensation for, and the Government has not heretofore recognized as justifying a demand upon the Treasury.

The committee therefore recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass? The bill was passed.

FRANCIS L. VALLE.

The bill (S. 374) for the relief of Francis L. Valle was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to that. There is an adverse report on that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL STEEL VESSELS.

Mr. HALE. I now move to take up the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 698) to authorize the construction of additional steel vessels for the Navy.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the first amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], in line 4, section 1, after the word "of," to strike out "seven" and insert "four," on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Before that vote is taken I wish to call attention to a denial made on the other side of the Chamber of a statement made by myself with respect to one of the vessels which the bill proposes to duplicate.

I supposed when we passed the bill last year making provision for the building of a certain number of cruisers they were to be, as the bill characterized them and classed them, "commerce-destroyers." I stated that the so-called Dolphin was nothing but a steam-yacht for the use of the Admiral or fleet-officer. That was denied. I wish to read from the testimony before the committee of Rear-Admiral Shufeldt, the present president of the advisory board. Speaking of the Dolphin, he says:

An admiral with such a boat can go anywhere he likes and with what speed he likes without toting along a heavy frigate. It is quite the custom now in France and England to have in every squadron a ship like the Dolphin.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. You speak of the Dolphin being peculiarly adapted as a flagship. As to size, what vessels in our Navy would she compare with?

Admiral SHUFELDT. We have not anything in the Navy that she is like; she is simply a yacht. If you amplify her, and build her a little larger, and give her a heavier gun, she becomes a commerce destroyer.

In other words she is a yacht. So says the admiral. If you build her over anew and make her "a little larger and give her a heavier gun," she will be exactly what the bill ordered to be built, a commerce destroyer, which the advisory board did not see fit to follow.

It is said that I also called in question on the floor of the Senate the ability of the gentlemen who comprise the advisory board. I excepted in my criticism the distinguished admiral who stands at the head of the board as its president. I would not detract one particle from that officer's ability or from the reward that is due to his services; but he does not pretend to be a constructor, neither does he claim to be an engineer (both necessary in making a naval war ship). I have nothing in the way of criticism to say of the two meritorious young officers who were called to represent the line of the Navy. My remarks were directed to the only two representatives of the constructors and engineers of the Navy Department. I spoke of Mr. Fernald, the constructor, and of Mr. Henderson, the engineer, and call attention to their records as officers of ability and experience.

I now turn back to the year 1877, to a report made by the House Committee on Naval Affairs with respect to the condition of the Navy previous to that period, and I find that Mr. Fernald and Mr. Henderson were both members of a board which examined the noted Puritan. They recommended that the vessel be completed. Let me read their recommendation:

This vessel, when completed under the designs of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, will be the most powerful vessel ever owned by the Government, and equal in strength of attack and resistance to any yet built by foreign powers and as yet put in commission.

* * * * * * *

We have to make the following recommendations as for the best interests of the Government, namely: that as the old material of armor-plating, turrets, and machinery of the Roanoke can not be used for any available purpose by the Department, it could, in our opinion, be most economically utilized in the completion of the Puritan. To dispose of the Roanoke by auction, or to break up the vessel in the navy-yard, would hardly yield greater value in old material than would pay the cost of so doing.

I will not narrate all the scandals that have followed the ship Roanoke. I only bring the fact before the Senate that those two gentlemen recommended that this ship be turned over to John Roach to break up. I now call attention to the other fact that afterwards four different boards of distinguished naval officers condemned the same ship that these gentlemen recommended to be completed in accordance with the contract and specifications. I will call attention to the report of one board. There was the Mullany board, and the board presided over by Commodore Stevens; I can not remember all who were at the head of these boards, but I know there were three boards of survey. The board of naval officers of which Rear-Admiral Mullany was president, consisting of two naval officers, three naval constructors, and three engineers, condemned the very vessel that these two gentlemen had asked to have completed and recommended should be completed. This report speaks of three different boards, but I have not now immediately under my eye the names of the officers who presided over the different boards. I only call attention to this particular one.

I find also in the Whitthorne report—and that House committee found it necessary in their investigation to examine very many officers of the Navy as to their relations with matters and things which were considered at that time very objectionable. I turn to page 27 of the report and I find this:

There are other agents of the Government whose conduct in the public service deserves to be inquired into by the executive department.

And Mr. Henderson, chief engineer of the Navy, is named as one of them. I am not speaking from absolute knowledge, but somewhat from recollection, when I say that neither Mr. Fernald nor Mr. Henderson has been asked by any Secretary of the Navy since Mr. Robeson's administration until the administration of Mr. Chandler to do any particular active service in the Navy. If I am mistaken in this I will make the proper amende, but I think I am not.

Now, sir, when I antagonize the recommendations of two gentlemen—whom the record proves were very much mistaken, to say the least, on a former occasion—with the opinions of the most distinguished officers of the Navy then and now, I think I am fully justified in asking the Senate to refrain from making any more appropriations of money for like ships until the actual ships be tested, which I propose in my amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. Has not the recommendation of these two officers, Mr. Henderson and Mr. Fernald, that the Puritan be completed been carried out by law since that time, and have we not made an appropriation for the completion of the very vessel which they recommended and which subsequent boards opposed?

Mr. MCPHERSON. That is a very proper question, and I thank the Senator for asking it. My answer is this: the Puritan is being completed, but it is being completed under entirely different conditions from that originally proposed and from the conditions under which they recommended that the ship should be completed. A vast amount of weight has been taken from the vessel in order that she may be made able to float, and entirely at the loss of the military efficiency of the vessel. She is in no sense so efficient a vessel as she was intended to be. I talked last evening with a gentleman who was a member of the last board upon the Puritan, and the information he gave me was that they had taken off as many pounds as possible from the weight of the ship in order that the ship might be able to float. They had cut down the supply of coal to the amount of ninety tons; they had subtracted everywhere from her weight in order that under the original plan the ship might swim instead of sinking when launched.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the Senator another question. I ask whether the condition imposed upon the proceeding with the work of the completion of the Puritan was not that after she was launched in the water she should be loaded with weights sufficient to equal all her armament, boilers, engines, and armor, and all the necessary weights that would fit her for a naval vessel, and whether it was not the fact that that vessel when launched was loaded in excess of all the weight she would be called upon to carry in active service before there was an effort made to fit out the vessel? Was that not a condition imposed, and was it not carried out and a report made to Congress to that effect?

Mr. McPHERSON. I think the Senator has confounded the Miantonomoh with the Puritan. Such a course was adopted with the Miantonomoh, but she was not built upon the same plan on which the Puritan was built. I do not know that the same course was applied to the Puritan; I never heard of it, but if at all, it was certainly after all the reductions of which I have spoken had been made and they were considered sufficient to enable the vessel to float. But as to the Miantonomoh I know that course was adopted, though I have no knowledge that it was ever applied to the Puritan, and I am quite sure it never was. I think there has ever been a wholesome fear on the part of the Navy Department to place very much weight on the deck of the Puritan.

Mr. CONGER. I did not intend, nor have I the information to enable me to discuss this question properly. I think, however, it is within the knowledge of all who have paid any attention to it that there was put on the Miantonomoh, in addition to the weight which she had with all her machinery and armament, additional iron armor and plated armor to the extent of several tons, and she went into service in that way. As to the Puritan, which I understand was built in Philadelphia, the law required that the Puritan, when launched, although some of these same men who reported against completing her said it was dangerous to launch the Puritan because she would go down of her own weight from what was then upon the shell of the vessel, should be loaded with an amount of metal in weight equal to all the proposed additional weight to be placed in her, her armament, her munitions, her coal, her cargo of every kind, and the sailors that were to be placed on her ready for service.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just there?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator is speaking of the Miantonomoh.

Mr. CONGER. No; I am speaking now of the Puritan. I say that the Puritan received not only all the armament intended for her, but received in addition a great many tons of plated armor and went into service in that way.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator will pardon me. I wish to show the difference between the Miantonomoh and the Puritan. The Miantonomoh, I understand, is very much of the Terror and Amphitrite class, built about after the same plan, if not identical, and I think there never has been any criticism perhaps upon those ships. The Puritan has been built under plans furnished to the Department by Mr. Roach himself; at least it is so stated in this report, and a mistake has been made, as is stated in the report, as to her displacement of a certain number of tons which absolutely made her worthless.

The error in this vessel—

As stated in this criticism—

was 4 feet 6 inches in the draught of water, and about 1,779 tons in the displacement. She can not be made of any use unless at least 900 tons of weight be removed, the consequence of which would be an enormous reduction in her offensive and defensive power and in her speed and time of steaming, rendering her unable to cope with foreign ironclads of similar type and dimensions.

Mr. CONGER. That is a report which was made before Congress examined the subject and before they passed a law making an appropriation to complete her, and before under the provisions of that law she was required after launching to be weighted as I have stated. The whole subject since that report has been before Congress and the completion of the vessel has been proceeded with. The requirements of the law in regard to her have been fulfilled. There has been for years past a difference of opinion among the constructors and engineers of the Navy and civilian engineers and constructors of vessels, with diverse reports; and the Senator has got one set of them. Those reports on which he relies have been overruled, they have been condemned by Congress, and Congress has proceeded with the work of finishing the Puritan.

Mr. McPHERSON. There is one other fact I wish to present to the Senate before we vote. Under my amendment, leaving the bill as that amendment will leave it if agreed to, provision is made for the expenditure of $2,270,000 for new vessels under the estimate of the Secretary of the Navy. The cost of the four gunboats, the ram, and the two torpedo boats, under the estimates made by the Secretary of the Navy, will amount to $2,270,000. This part of the construction account, my amendment does not interfere with at all. It simply stops the building of the cruisers until those now under construction are tested, and goes on with the rest of the work.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from New Jersey state distinctly the number of wooden vessels that have been retired from the naval register?

Mr. McPHERSON. I read from page 162 of the Secretary's report:

In accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress approved August 5, 1882, making appropriations for the naval service, boards were appointed to examine all the vessels of the Navy and to report which of them were unfit for further service, or if the same were unfinished in any navy-yard, to report which could not be finished without great and disproportionate expense; and if the Secretary of the Navy concurred in opinion with the boards, he was directed to strike the names of such condemned vessels from the Navy Register and report the fact to Congress. These boards made their examinations, and upon their reports, concurred in by the Secretary, the following-named vessels have been stricken from the Navy Register: Congress, Guard, Kansas, Plymouth, Emerald, Massachusetts, Sabine, Connecticut, Iowa, Niagara, Oregon, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Florida, Blue Light, New Orleans, Colossus, Java, Susquehanna, Glance, Burlington, Supply, Sorrel, Antietam, Dictator, Frolic, Relief, Pawnee, Rose, Benicia, old Monadnock, Narragansett, Nyack, Saco, Tuscarora, Alaska, Worcester, Canandaigua, Jean Sands, Shawmut, Savannah, Santee, Phlox, Wyoming, Roanoke, Cyane.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am much obliged to the Senator for that information. I do not intend to protract this debate, but I wish to draw the attention of the Senate and of the country to the attitude of this body at the last session on the proposition which led to this result.

The bill before the Senate to-day cannot be said to be the initiative measure looking to the construction of a navy. We went over this ground very fully at the last session and the session before, as the debates before me clearly indicate, and, as I said yesterday to my distinguished friend from New Jersey, I stood shoulder to shoulder with him in resisting the provision of law that led to the result that he has just announced to the Senate.

It was distinctly stated here very candidly by the gentleman who had in view the creation of a new navy that they proposed to put out of existence those wooden ships in order to replace them by superior vessels, and that amendment was brought forth for that purpose. I thought at the time, as I think now, that we should have gone on without it. Now I say that those gentlemen who voted for the amendment which has led to the retirement of this large number of wooden ships that were necessary to the public defense ought in my opinion in consistency to do something to replace them.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator indulge me for a moment?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, sir.

Mr. McPHERSON. If the honorable Senator from Florida had been Secretary of the Navy and found such a statute that was absolutely destructive to the interests of the country, would he have suspended operations under it for one year and reported the fact to Congress and asked for additional power, or would he have proceeded with the work of destruction under the law?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. This question has been pending now for two years, and the step that was taken two years ago was a first step in the direction of creating a navy; and I say that those gentlemen who intended to antagonize this policy ought to have done it then and not have given power to the Navy Department to put aside all our wooden ships and leave the country in an absolutely defenseless position.

Look at the vote on the proposition that was brought forth at the last session, and that by my friend from Kansas not now in his seat [Mr. INGALLS]. The proposition of the Senator from Kansas was to reduce the percentage from 30 to 20 per cent. As the bill came from the House 30 per cent. was the percentage fixed upon to give the Secretary power to retire a ship from the Navy. I contended at the time that it did not come up to the standard fixed for ordinary interests by commercial law. I took the ground that one-third new for old was the rule that prevailed in commercial circles, and that an insured party could not abandon his ship to an underwriter and claim as for a total loss unless the amount of damage was equal to one-third of the value of the ship—one-third new for old. They fixed it at 30 per cent. in the other House, and I resisted it here, but that did not satisfy the temper of this body. and the Senator from Kansas now near me [Mr. INGALLS] brought forth his amendment and insisted that it should be reduced to 20 per cent., and the vote was taken upon that proposition in favor of bringing it down to 20 per cent., and it was carried. This was the vote.

Under that act these vessels have been retired from the Navy; and in the debate that then took place I undertook to prophesy the result that has followed, as well as my friend from New Jersey. We said that this was a power that never had been given to a Secretary of the Navy before, and it ought not to have been given then. My friend from Kansas, the junior Senator [Mr. PLUMB], got up and said this was a contest between navy-yards and ship-builders, and that all these old hulks ought to be got rid of.

Mr. PLUMB. Now, I recollect that I said to my friend from Florida that it was a contest between the navy-yards and a navy.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Having taken this serious step in the direction of retiring this very large proportion of the public force as existing under former laws, is there not an obligation somewhere to replace it? If it was not the intention of Congress in bringing forth this legislation to give the power to the Secretary to do away with our wooden vessels in order to replace them by superior ships, the attitude of Congress is a ridiculous one. It was known to the country when this proposition was brought forth that it was in pursuance of a policy well considered and avowed by the gentleman who had these measures in charge; that there was an intention existing to change the character of our ships. I at the time did not think it a wise thing to do, because I thought that we should have gone on and have retained our wooden vessels and have added to them ships of a superior quality conforming to the changes in naval architecture, and thus have accomplished all that was necessary and proper to be done. The Senate voted me down. They said to the Secretary, "You shall do away with these vessels; you shall retire them;" and he is going on to do it, and in a year or so under this law there will not be a wooden ship in the Navy to bear your flag.

Even my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] not now in his seat was on that side. He voted for this proposition. He was in full accord with the gentlemen who had the bill in charge at the last session, and there was no concealment or disguise about it that it was an initiative step looking to the creation of a new navy that would be adequate to the wants of the country and necessary to preserve and protect its interests and flag. And now, after the law has been put into operation and after the result has followed as stated by my friend from New Jersey, we are met by the Senators who urged the adoption of this measure with objections to making an appropriation of a dollar to supply the place of the ships that were retired under their votes. I was committed to the policy partly, but did not go as far as they wanted to go at the time. You have either got to go on or to stop the operation of this law; take back your own votes, and say that the Secretary shall not retire more wooden ships and that you do not intend to vote a dollar to replace them.

I said yesterday that I thought it was a very unwise policy on the part of those who favored a new navy, because it gave rise to suspicion in the country that this great end was not attempted to be accomplished in a plain, straightforward way. Contemporaneous with this proceeding there was another to which I did not make any reference yesterday, a commission to look into the state of the navy-yards to see what navy-yards ought to be abolished and what retained. All this I say has given rise to a suspicion in the public mind which for one I would prefer should not exist there. But notwithstanding that, Congress having committed itself to this policy, it should either go forward or retreat.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida is right in his statement in respect to the action taken by the Senate heretofore, and the motives of that action, in retiring the old wooden ships of the Navy. Those of us who favored the measure fixing the limit of repairs at 20 per cent. did so because we did not believe that a wooden navy such as existed, and particularly in respect of the ships which have been retired, was a navy at all. I regard it as a most fortunate circumstance for the Government of the United States that these ships have been retired, and I shall regard it fortunate for the country if nearly all the remaining wooden ships of the Navy be retired within a reasonable time, because if this nation needs a navy at all it needs an efficient navy, a navy that is good for something, either in attack or in defense, and a wooden navy is utterly useless. To go into battle with these wooden ships is like arming men with bows and arrows to fight a force armed with modern guns of precision.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. MILLER, of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Admitting all he says to be true, I ask the Senator if he would have favored a measure looking to the retirement of wooden ships if he did not entertain a conviction that their place would be substituted by superior vessels?

Mr. MILLER, of California. Certainly, and I expect their place to be taken by superior vessels, by modern vessels of war. I do not believe that this nation is either so mean or so foolish as to attempt to take its place among the great nations of the earth and keep it without a navy.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. MILLER, of California. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator says the wooden ships are of no use in a naval engagement. Would he venture into a very serious naval engagement with these so-called cruisers against the formidable ironclads of foreign powers? Will he not, before answering that question, let me ask another, and he can answer them both?

Mr. MILLER, of California. One question at a time is about as much as one man ought to be expected to answer.

Mr. McPHERSON. Did the Senator hear the testimony of Chief-Constructor Wilson before the committee, in which he says, speaking of the New York, a wooden ship:

> There is one point to be taken into consideration in relation to that ship. The ship is all in frame. Her boilers are one-half to two-thirds constructed. Mr. Henderson can tell you about them. They are of the modern type. That ship for about $400,000 ought to be finished, so far as the Department of Construction is concerned, and while she is a wooden ship she can be equally as efficient a ship, so far as carrying a modern battery and having the same fire from her battery, and she would be equally good with the Chicago.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I do not choose to discuss the question whether the New York if finished would be a formidable competitor with the Chicago, nor do I place much confidence in the opinion of a wooden-ship builder in respect to the construction of modern steel ships. As to the first branch of the Senator's question, I do not suppose that anybody expects a cruiser to fight an ironclad. Cruisers are not built for that purpose. We do not expect that when we have built these cruisers, whether they be few or many, we shall have a complete navy. The Navy will not be complete, will not be able to contend against the navies of the other great powers, until we have built ironclads of similar construction and similar power with those which now exist in England and Italy and Germany and perhaps other countries.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to ask the Senator from California, if he will allow me, for information, what is the comparative power of resistance between a steel ship like the Chicago and a wooden ship of the same tonnage?

Mr. MILLER, of California. I can not answer that question. It is a scientific one.

Mr. MORGAN. Has that question ever been answered before the committee?

Mr. MILLER, of California. I do not know whether it has or not.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose the advantage which a steel ship possesses over a wooden ship is its durability more than anything else.

Mr. MILLER, of California. That I suppose to be the chief advantage. The sides of these cruisers will not offer any great resistance to a shot from a modern gun. I have no doubt that, struck above the water-line by a shot from a modern gun, they would receive great injury; the shot would go through them. It is attempted in the plan of these ships to protect the machinery by a protected deck made of steel, which covers all the machinery, and the construction of that deck is such that perhaps a shot would be deflected if it struck in that portion of the ship. Of course a shot will do no great damage below the water-line; but above this deflective protected deck, if a shot should strike the ship, it would unquestionably go through it, but perhaps without injuring the machinery.

These ships are not intended as great fighting ships. You must remember it is only the beginning of the construction of a navy that is here proposed, and the question here presented is whether the United States wants a navy at all. That I understand to be really the question which has been discussed here.

Senators make objections of one sort and another to this bill. One says that he is opposed to the methods of construction, and wants to wait until better methods are devised. Another says that he desires to wait before passing the bill for the construction of new vessels until the tariff laws are changed, so that, as he argues, we can save 45 per cent. in the construction of these ships. Another says that we are not to have any war and therefore why build ships? Another says, wait till next December, until we try the ships now being constructed. All these objections tend in one direction, and that is to prevent the Government having a navy at all.

Mr. McPHERSON. And the work of destruction goes on.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The work of construction goes on as authorized by Congress.

Mr. McPHERSON. The work of destruction, I said, not construction.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I did not understand the Senator. The work of destruction, as the Senator calls it, will go on from natural causes. The life of a wooden ship is not long at best, and it costs more to repair and to keep in repair the wooden ships you now have in commission, taking a series of say ten or fifteen years, than it would to build new ships which are ascertained by testimony to be good, to last for fifty years.

If we are to have a navy at all, it is time that we began to build it. It is good policy, I think, that we should continue as we have begun, and go forward, do something every year, do as much as we can afford to do, and build that class of ships which the Government needs the most, and which will be most effective if trouble should come, or which would be best adapted for the service of the Navy now, whatever that service may be. If you stop now for any purpose, if you wait to test the ships under construction, this session will have passed and the next session will have passed, and you will have lost two years of time in this work of rebuilding your Navy.

The Senator from Kentucky wants us to wait until December so as to enable us to have a test of the capacity and power of the new vessels now under construction. In that he is mistaken. The testimony taken before the committee shows that the Dolphin, which is not of very great consequence I think, will be finished about next August, and the Chicago and Atlanta six months later. Let me read from the testimony of Secretary Chandler:

> Senator McPHERSON. Then before any action would need to be taken by another session of Congress we could get something like a comparative test of the value of this property and the merits of the ships generally?
> Secretary CHANDLER. You certainly could of the Dolphin, but it is doubtful whether we could exhibit the performance of the Chicago, the Boston, and the Atlanta as early as the 1st of February of next year.

That will be in the middle of the next session, the short session of Congress. It is extremely doubtful whether by that time a satisfactory test can be made. If any tests are needed to satisfy Senators of the worth and value of these ships it will be the middle of the next session of Congress before it can be had, and then it will be impossible to pass any bill through Congress at that session providing for the construction of new ships. The subject will then go over until the next Congress, and probably a year later Congress will mature a plan, pass a bill, and the Department can go forward in the construction of ships. This delays it two years. I think it is fair to assume that if this bill does not pass no additional ships of war than those now under construction will be begun before two years from this time.

Now, according to the testimony of Admiral Porter, in four years more there will not be a wooden ship of this Navy in commission, not one fit for service if the act of Congress is carried out fixing the limit of repair at 20 per cent.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Did I understand the Senator to say there would not be a wooden ship?

Mr. MILLER, of California. In four years, if I understand the testimony of the Admiral, the ships will be out of commission under the operation of this act of Congress.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me right there to call his attention again to the testimony of Mr. Wilson? This is an addition to the other statement which I made. Speaking of the Vandalia, he says:

The Vandalia has been in commission about seven years or something like that. She has been commissioned twice, and we have found no rotten wood about her There was some defective wood where she had been in collision once or twice; some abrasions that had to be attended to. Of course she would not have the lifetime an iron or steel ship would have, but she would be a good ship for fifteen years to come.

Senator MCPHERSON. What other ships occupy nearly the same position?

Chief Constructor WILSON. There is the Pensacola, on her way home from the Pacific; the Hartford will soon start home; the Lackawanna; the Tennessee. None of these ships can be repaired under that law. The Powhatan could not be again repaired, and about six years will wipe out the entire navy of wooden ships under the present 20 per cent. law.

Mr MILLER, of California. Whose testimony is that?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. Wilson's. He speaks also of the vessels which should be repaired. He says:

But I think the Swatara, Plymouth, Adams, and Essex (a different class of vessels) ought all to be kept in order. They are modern ships, of as good model as any navy in the world owns of their type and class.

Can not the Senator find a place for the appropriation he is so anxious to make in putting these ships in good order at moderate expense?

Mr. MILLER, of California. The Senator reads from the Chief Constructor of the Navy, who is a wooden-ship builder, who believes in wooden ships, and he admits that the wooden ships will go out of existence in six years under the operation of the present law of Congress; the Admiral of the Navy puts it at four years. The Senator asks me whether we can not find opportunity for expending the appropriations we desire to make on the wooden ships. I suppose we could, and a great deal more. I suppose we can go on and deplete the Treasury of the United States on these wooden ships, if we are foolish enough to do it. Why go on and repair these wooden ships when they are useless, or next to useless, as a navy? Why spend thousands and tens of thousands and perhaps millions of dollars upon a property that is utterly useless, and with which you dare not go into action? It is true that some of these ships may be made useful as training-ships, storeships, and perhaps for other purposes. I do not desire to condemn them all at once; and certainly if Congress is not going to appropriate money to build a navy of the modern type of war vessels I am in favor of keeping some of the wooden ships in commission and spending some money on them.

I regard every dollar, or nearly so, that is expended on the repairs of these old ships as being money thrown away, and worse than thrown away. They are no dependence. It seems to me the very essence of folly to go on spending the money of the people upon useless craft none of which could stand before a modern vessel of war fifteen minutes without being shattered into splinters.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. May I ask the Senator how long one of these wooden ships of war would ordinarily run without a necessity for repairs? We do not have to repair them every year.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Not every year. After they are rebuilt and made as good as new they might run four or five years without repairs. Then you have to repair again, and there is no end to the repairing of wooden ships when they once begin to deteriorate. That has been found so in the merchant service. They are condemned in the merchant service and iron ships are being substituted all over the world for wooden ships, and for the reason that the iron ships last longer and are kept up at much less expense than the wooden ships.

Mr. BUTLER. Admiral Porter says iron ships will last forty or fifty years.

Mr. MILLER, of California. As I said before, the steel ships we are building, with proper care taken of them, will last forty or fifty years, and the experience of ship-owners in the merchant service proves the truth of the statement.

Mr. President, I am in favor of making liberal appropriations to be expended in the construction of a new navy or of a navy, for at this time we have no navy. It is not worthy of the name of a navy except the personnel. I am in favor of constructing American men-of-war from American material, by American workmen, to be manned by American seamen, and to be used in the service of the Government of the United States, whatever that service may call for, and I am in favor of constructing just such ships as will be effective and useful and economical and will serve the purpose for which a navy is intended.

Here we are, a nation of 56,000,000 people, occupying the center of a mighty continent washed by the two great oceans, with a coast line greater in distance than the circumference of the globe, with its multifarious bays and inlets and sounds and deep river ways decorated by great cities and prosperous towns. Ours is a young nation it may be, but growing with a marvelous growth and strengthening with a prodigious strength, a nation proud, it may be imperious, self-satisfied; and if this nation intends to take its place, as it should take its place, among the great nations of the earth and contend with the leading maritime powers for the commerce of the western hemisphere, it is time that she should be prepared to meet either the encroachments or the attacks of those powers which have become jealous of this great nation springing up here in the West and whose example of free government and free institutions is spreading the contagion of free thought and the freedom of individual action among all the peoples of the globe, and is engendering and exciting the hatred and malice and unfriendliness of imperialists and monarchists throughout the world. I say it is time that this nation should be prepared, because it can not expect to go forward in its career of prosperity without exciting the jealousy, and perhaps bringing upon itself the attacks, of great maritime powers.

There is such a thing too as national honor and national pride. I want to see the American Government, this young giant of the West, stand ready to resent insults that may be heaped upon her, come from what quarter they may. I do not invite war; I do not expect war; but in time of peace prepare for war. No man can forecast the future. The mantle of prophecy has fallen upon no man in the Senate who can predict a perpetual peace. Senators say there will be no war. How do we know that? It has been well said in this debate that a good, strong, powerful navy is the best guarantee of peace, the best safeguard against attacks from abroad. Your coasts, your towns and cities upon your coasts, your harbors and your bays, are to-day in a defenseless condition. There is not a gun in place in a fort upon a parapet, not an earthwork, not any work of defense anywhere in this great land which could make the slightest impression upon a first-class ironclad of Great Britain which might steam into your harbors with hostile intent.

You ask me what kind of a navy I would have. I unhesitatingly say that if I had myself the planning of a navy I would not build all the vessels of this class. I would not build all cruisers. We ought to have some ironclads of the first class, but they cost large sums of money; they cost from four to five million dollars. I do not know that the country is ready to begin the construction of such vessels. But these cruisers, commerce destroyers, gunboats, for the defense of your coast and for operating in the shallow waters of foreign countries, are the class of vessels which would be most needed if we had no others.

It is in order to begin the building of a navy, to commence the building up of this new navy, that we put forward the proposition to build cruisers of three classes and gunboats. We know these will not be a complete navy; our establishment then will not be able to cope with the English navy, the German or Italian navy, but it will be something, and I think the country expects something.

I do not believe that it is wisdom to delay. None of the reasons for delay which have been given seem to me to be sufficient. There is perhaps a reason behind all this which has not been expressed. I shall not go into that. But if we wait until everybody who has had anything to do with the construction of ships agrees upon what particular kind of ships we are to build we shall never have any.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] enters upon a criticism of Mr. Fernald and some other officers of the advisory board, and he attempts to exalt a gentleman not on the board, who seems to be the critic of the Navy, a Mr. Isherwood. I say to the Senator that it is not only the opinion of the advisory board upon which we rely, but it is the opinion of other officers of the Navy of high repute and high standing, who agree with the advisory board. I think never in the history of the Navy has there been such a concurrence of opinion by distinguished officers of the Navy as there now is upon the very proposition to build these cruisers at this time.

The Senator from New Jersey criticises the advisory board. We must trust somebody. Are we going to take his opinion against the advisory board? Are we going to set up the opinion of Mr. Isherwood against the advisory board? Are we going to set up the opinion of Mr. Wilson against the advisory board? When I speak of the opinion of the advisory board it is not only that, but it is the opinion of nine-tenths of the prominent and efficient and able officers of the Navy who sustain the advisory board. We have the testimony here in this report of half a dozen officers of the Navy of the highest repute, and all of them agree in sustaining the report and the plans of the advisory board. If you are going to wait until every man in the Navy and every man out of the Navy who thinks he knows something about ships and ship-building and vessels of war all concur in opinion, we may wait forever, frittering away our time here, allowing the opportunity to pass, and never doing anything, and we shall never have any navy.

I think that this Government is about to enter upon a new era. We have been busy in the development of our country, busy with ourselves. We have been not only engaged in the great work of the development of our natural resources, but we have been engaged in a great war between two sections of this Union; we have been, as I said, busy with ourselves, and for many years we have not looked out upon the world and seen those opportunities to extend our commerce and our trade which we might have seen had we not been thus occupied. The time has come now when the country is prosperous, when manufactures are springing up all over the land, when new markets are necessary to be found in order to keep our factories running. Here lies to the south of us our India, and if we have the nerve, and the foresight, and the sagacity to utilize it by proper methods we shall have new markets for our products and for our manufactures which will keep every loom, and every anvil, and every manufactory of this country in motion. If we reach out and attempt to secure this great prize of commerce we shall excite the jealousy of other peoples, and we shall be led, perhaps, into complications, which we shall extricate ourselves from if we are prepared to meet our enemies; but if we are not prepared we shall fall, for a time at least, an easy prey to the cupidity of those who will contend against us.

I should like to give some time to the arguments of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] in respect of the saving which he thinks we can effect by a change of the tariff act in some way. I do not think, however, that the tariff question is mixed up with the question of rebuilding the Navy. I can see no application of that question to the subject in hand. It does not follow because there is a duty upon steel of about 45 per cent. ad valorem that ships of war will cost 45 per cent. more when constructed in this country, because at this very moment the class of steel which is being put into these steel ships is made in this country nearly as cheaply as it is in England—there is very little difference in the cost of it—and if the ship-builder should go to England and import it and pay the duty upon it, and that duty should be added to the cost of the vessel to the United States, the United States would lose nothing; it would be putting it in one pocket and taking it out of another.

I desire to see these ships built in the United States and built of American material. I desire to see the art of ship-building fostered in this country, because if we rely entirely upon foreign governments for our ships of war, for the materials of which they are composed, for our guns, our torpedoes, and our shot and shell, then when we get into difficulty it will be impossible to obtain them. We must foster ship-building in this country; our people must be trained to understand this art. They do understand it, and they will grow to understand it more and more, until there will be no need to go abroad for any of the articles, for any of the material of war, and we shall be perfectly independent of the whole world upon this score.

Mr. BUTLER. If it would not interrupt my friend I should like at that particular point in his remarks to read a letter from Rear-Admiral Rodgers which I received this morning. It is somewhat long, but if it will not disturb the Senator I will read it.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Not at all; I should be glad to hear it read.

Mr. BUTLER. It is on that point, a letter written at my request, from Rear-Admiral Rodgers, now on the retired-list of the Navy:

1721 I STREET, WASHINGTON, D. C., February 28, 1884.

MY DEAR SENATOR: There is an evident misapprehension as to the purchase by England of Krupp cannon and Whitehead torpedoes. I do not think that Great Britain has one Krupp gun mounted in a ship or in her fortifications. That wise country makes its own guns and is rich in gun-makers. Its Whitehead torpedoes are also made in England. Whitehead, a British mechanician, invented this formidable weapon, and sold the privilege and secret first to the Austrian Government, and the experiments with it were made at Fiume, an Austrian station upon the Adriatic. The secret and privilege were offered to any government that would pay the price. England made the purchase, improved the plan, manufactures the torpedoes largely, and uses them extensively in her fleet. Our Government declined to buy the secret, but I believe our Bureau of Ordnance possesses it. There has been a revolution in naval ordnance, to which Krupp has largely contributed, England, with its enormous store of muzzle-loading cannon, for a long time refused to recognize the vastly superior system of breech-loading which had been adopted in Germany and France. It can no longer hold that belief, and it is making haste to rearm its ships and forts with breech-loading guns of the most approved pattern. We have not a single breech-loading gun in any of our ships nor upon any of our forts. Nor can we make one of more than 6 inches caliber in this country, and our ability to make even this small gun has been only developed within the last year. We have 7,000 miles of coast, and not a good gun for its defense. We are like a great jelly-fish, huge in bulk but powerless to strike back if assailed. What we most need to-day are gun-makers and the plant for gun-making. No country is wise if it fails to provide the means of forging its own weapons of defense. Even the stoutest free-trader will probably acquiesce in the theory that we should foster the industries necessary to arm our people for their own defense; and unless Congress shall vote money for guns very freely, we shall, in the event of war, be unable to provide either our forts or our ships with modern guns. They can not be made quickly; they are only made to order; and we should be able to make them ourselves in our own well-appointed shops and by our own skilled workmen. A well-armed nation, or one prepared to arm itself quickly from its own resources, is much less likely to be attacked than one huge in bulk, rich in the unprotected wealth of its shores, and unprovided with ships and cannon. I beg that you will read the report of the very able ordnance board that has just returned from Europe. It is very instructive.

Always faithfully yours,

C. R. P. RODGERS.

Hon. M. C. BUTLER, U. S. Senate.

Being upon the line of discussion which the Senator was following, I thought perhaps it might aid him.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I am under great obligations to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator add just one word to that in the same line precisely? Great Britain has a great many Gatling guns and is making more all the while, but requires that every one of them shall be built in England.

Mr. HALE. Our patterns.

Mr. HAWLEY. Our patterns, the invention of our own citizens, made here in good style, and we can have them all made at home.

Mr. MILLER, of California. There is much wisdom in the letter of Rear-Admiral Rodgers, one of the most competent and able officers of the Navy, and who I may say here sustains the advisory board, I believe in every particular. Certainly in his testimony before the committee I understood him to approve of the ships proposed to be built and those that are now being built. He is only one of the many accomplished officers of the Navy who hold to the opinions expressed in that letter. I believe that those opinions will meet with favor everywhere, with nearly all the people of this country, because they are in themselves wise, and that short letter expresses the whole matter as forcibly and clearly as it can be expressed.

There has been much brought into this debate which does not properly belong to a discussion of this question. All of the talk about frauds in the navy-yards has nothing to do with this question, in my judgment. I shall not attempt to divine the motive of Senators who have brought up the subject of the navy-yards in this connection; the motive may be praiseworthy; but I submit that when a question comes before the Senate relating to the management of navy-yards, in respect to their maintenance or their extension or making appropriations for them, then perhaps it will be time enough to look into the question of how the navy-yards have been conducted.

If a political advantage is attempted by this discussion, I think if the Senator who undertakes that will go back to the old Democratic time preceding the war he will find in official documents and records in the possession of the Senate sufficient evidence of fraud and mismanagement to offset and more than offset all that has ever been done under Republican administration. Perhaps no such intention exists, and I shall not go into that matter except to say that it is not proposed that these ships shall be built in Government navy-yards. That is not proposed, because it is an impossibility at this time. There is no navy-yard in this country which possesses the necessary plant, machinery, and appliances for constructing a ship of the size of the Chicago or even of the smaller size. The largest iron ship that has ever been built in any navy-yard in this country was the Alarm, which is a very small affair, and that at a cost immensely greater than it could have been built by contract. England, which has taken the lead in naval architecture and naval construction, builds it vessels by contract. Its navy-yards are used for fitting out the vessels and for casual repairs, but not for the construction of its great ships. Those are all let by contract.

If it is feared that the money to be appropriated by the bill for the construction of these ships may not be honestly and fairly expended, then let the gentlemen who have any doubts upon that subject propose such restrictions and such amendments to the bill as will make it impossible under any circumstances for a single dollar to be misapplied. I do not believe that it is possible for the Secretary of the Navy and the Navy Department or any officer of the Navy to so manage this appropriation as that he may gain anything for himself. He dare not do it. If gentlemen hesitate because of a want of confidence as was here expressed in the Navy Department, then I say let them throw around this measure such safeguards as they can invent, and the more strict they are the more willingly will I vote for the bill, and I am sure that the Navy Department will take no offense. But let us do something; let us either go on and build a navy, or decide that we are to have no navy. Let us either build or decide not to build, and not halt here after we have once begun, merely upon frivolous objections of one sort or another which have no foundation in reason.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the subject of this bill is so interesting and important that I venture to detain the Senate a few moments while I give some reasons for my approval of the bill as it came from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and for my unwillingness as at present advised to vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from New Jersey.

After waiting some eighteen years, since 1866, and spending $385,000,000 for that purpose, the people of the United States find themselves to-day absolutely without a navy, in the present definition of that term. I am only disposed to gather lessons of wisdom and instruction from the past and not to stir up strife. That there has been a fearful amount of incapacity and maladministration within the term mentioned, and in connection with the amount that I have referred to, nobody will deny; and those who are associated with and who are responsible for the perversion and maladministration of that enormous amount of money and loss of time must stand for judgment before the people of the United States.

It is plain however that in the last eighteen years, to be just, and to understand the position in which we now stand, there has been an absolute revolution in all former theories of naval architecture and armament and of naval warfare. Naval artillery and the ships that can withstand it have been the great problem, and that problem is yet unsolved, fortunately perhaps for us with small comparative cost although the people of the United States were the pioneers. They furnished the brains, the enterprise, and the courage that caused the first departure of the employment of wooden ships in naval warfare.

The engagement between the Monitor and the Merrimac in the Hampton Roads, Virginia, was the signal for a revolution of the navies of the world; but from that time onward the energies, the invention, and the capacities of our people seem to have slumbered. Other nations have caught up the idea then suggested and taught by that wonderful conflict in Hampton Roads in 1862; they have progressed in the building of navies and in the experiments upon armored ships at an enormous cost wholly their own, and the advantages of which I only hope that those who have charge of the administration of the Government of this country will gain some advantage, or that the country shall have gained something.

This revolution has been naturally progressive. Wood has given away to iron, and iron again to steel, and sails have given away to steam. What was a good man-of-war and serviceable fifteen or twenty years ago would be absolutely worthless to-day for purposes of usefulness or conflict—a mere tub, unable to fight and incapable of flight.

These facts have gradually come to the knowledge of our people, engaged as we have been in the work of restoring order in our own household, of developing the vast resources and territories lying between the two great oceans. At last our people have come to the conclusion that there must be an exterior line of defense, and that the seacoast of this country and the maintenance of our power as a commercial nation upon the high seas of the globe demand the creation of an American navy. I take it that there are few in this country who would be found in dissent to that proposition.

Two years ago the Congress of the United States took the first earnest step in this direction. There were four double-turreted iron monitors on the stocks. They had been begun in 1873, and had lain unfinished in all those years. After a series of boards of inspection composed of naval officers of intelligence and character selected by various administrations Congress determined to appropriate money for their being launched and in a certain degree completed to be ready for use.

On those four vessels there was a total cost of three and a half millions of money in round numbers, and even yet they are not ready for use because of the fact that the Government of the United States does not own a single navy-yard where iron vessels can be built and because it turns out that there is no machinery in this country capable of rolling the steel plates required for the turrets. The importation from other countries of the materials to make those turrets has, as I find by the report of the Secretary of the Navy, been found necessary, and I suppose that we may expect that those vessels will soon be put in commission. The sooner the better. It is a very short step toward remedying the defenseless condition of our seacoast and of our system of harbor defense, supposing that we have in that regard anything that may be dignified by being called a system.

In August, 1882, Congress agreed to build four steel cruisers, the Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, and Dolphin, at an aggregate cost of two million and a half. All this was accompanied by constant expressions of distrust in the Department having the duty of executing those laws.

Here I wish to say that which is never pleasant and to which I am not accustomed. It is impossible for us to ignore the fact that there is in this country, from one reason or another, a great deal of distrust in the head of the Navy Department. It was not, in the opinion of many who like myself are most anxious liberally to vote supplies for every Department of the Government and to make the fullest and amplest appropriation—it was not in the opinion of men who think as I do a wise thing for the President to have selected the present Secretary of the Navy for the place he now holds.

This is not a mere personal assault, it is the question of competency and fitness of the individual for the place. There was nothing in the antecedents, nothing in the prior occupation, nothing in the acquirements of the individual referred to that in our opinion rendered it wise or proper that he should be chosen for that place. I should be reluctant to give pain to any individual; I certainly have not the slightest wish to be otherwise than just and formally courteous; but these are public questions of great moment and they should be discussed in a fair, open, and public manner. I am not ambitious to be one of those who are supposed to be fond of calling a spade a spade, but I do believe that frankness and straightforwardness are essential in dealing with an important public subject, and in that spirit and in no other do I approach the one now under consideration.

The consequence was, that two years ago both Houses of Congress recognizing the fact that from one reason or another no matter what, but for reasons good and sufficient in the opinion of the majority of the two Houses of Congress, they did not commence these steps towards the creation of an American navy in the ordinary method which had been uniformly recognized in times gone by; but in order more especially to protect the Treasury and to avoid cavil or question upon this subject, to promote public efficiency without the risk of corrupt or undue expenditure they created by the act of 1882 a naval advisory board, to be selected by the Secretary of the Navy and yet at the same time to be independent of him in their judgment and selection of methods, models, and in their recommendation for the expenditure of public money in the creation of an armed American fleet.

I have here the appropriation act of August, 1882, which provided for the creation of this advisory board and coupled with it every safeguard that good sense and experience could suggest for the purpose of having the public moneys expended strictly and only for the public purpose for which they were designed. Here I will say to the Senator from Maine who has this bill in charge that I have no reason from my personal knowledge to doubt the truth of what he said yesterday that within the last two or three years the administration of the Naval Department had been clean-handed, for it will be observed I am not making any charge. Should I make any charge I would make it upon my own responsibility and coupled with the full proof, but for the purpose of stating the truth as it exists I have made the reflections I have in regard to the present tenure of this important Cabinet position.

I wish to refer to the act creating this advisory board, and which, by the way, ought to accompany the present bill as a condition under which the work now contemplated shall be prosecuted.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator let me interrupt him there?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I do not know that he was present the other day when I stated that I had an amendment to offer from the committee, putting this entire work under the regulations and restrictions of the two appropriation acts of 1882 and 1883. I did not have the amendment at my desk at that time, but I propose before we proceed to vote upon any amendment to offer that from the committee, and I presume nobody will object. It will cover the precise point now made by the Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. I am very glad to hear that; and I think it very essential that it should accompany the present bill and be ingrafted upon it——

Mr. HALE. I do.

Mr. BAYARD. I find the report of Senator's debate yesterday and I find reference to a portion of these conditions under which the work upon the ships authorized in 1882 were to be conducted.

Mr. HALE. I propose to have all those conditions thrown around this work, and the amendment itself is suggested by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to say that will be satisfactory and eminently proper. It is simply the repetition by Congress of their desire to satisfy the minds of the people of this country and the minds of all who vote for this bill that the money will be expended subject to every wise guard that legislation can decree.

The naval advisory board was formed; its recommendations have been accepted by Congress and approved. The whole of the appropriations, those to finish the double-turreted monitors, those to finish the four cruisers authorized by the law of 1882, and those to finish the seven vessels proposed by the present bill, will not cost as much as two of the expensive ironclads owned by what may be called the second-rate naval powers of Europe. That is to say, the Kingdom of Italy and the Empire of Germany each have a single vessel the cost of which combined would be greater than the entire cost of the four monitors, the four cruisers of 1882, and the seven vessels now proposed. Am I not right in that?

Mr. HALE. That is correct.

Mr. BAYARD. So that we can not be accused of rushing hastily or too extensively or expensively into this much-needed step for the national defense.

I know that in 1882 and 1883 when the contracts for the four cruisers of which the Chicago is the most conspicuous feature were given out there was a condition growing out of the obscurity of our tariff duties upon steel and still more growing out of the revolution that then was progressing in the manufacture of steel that rendered it doubtful whether any contractor who bid for the construction of those vessels could procure in the United States steel having the tensile power required by the specifications, or if procurable at what rate? I think that is fairly answered by the statement of the Secretary of the Navy found at page 1546 of the RECORD and in the debate of the 27th. After speaking of the estimates of Mr. Roach he was asked by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] whether the tests of steel had never been accurately made. He replied:

> Never in this country had any steel been manufactured in large quantities subjected to such rigid tests. Of course to produce steel with exactly those qualities requires a careful chemical admixture in preparing the charges for the furnace and in handling the material; and while it had been done for a few plates of steel, it never had been done with thousands of tons before. Here was the element of uncertainty. It has been very happily surmounted, and it now appears that the steel manufacturers can make an admixture that will give steel possessing those qualities, and make it with certainty and celerity, and it is a great triumph for our manufacturers that they have been able to do it.
> Mr. STEERS. The advisory board has brought down steel from 8½ to 4½ cents.

a pound. Those who refused to furnish the steel, who were unsuccessful bidders, at 7 cents a pound would be very glad now to make it for 4½. Mr. Roach, when he gave the contract for steel for these ships only gave it partially, and he has some yet to be given out. The steel-makers will be very glad to take it at 4½ cents a pound, and it ought to be less than that.

I merely refer to that. It was a subject of unfavorable comment and of natural suspicion, and in some cases of denunciation, that with the known relations personally of the present Secretary of the Navy with a certain contractor whose agent he had been in this Capitol for many years, all the contracts for those cruisers should have been awarded to that individual. I have a strong personal feeling and interest in comprehending and farthering this matter of ship-building. I mean by that, my interest as a Senator in the legislation connected with it and the progress and success of ship-building in this country; of course I have no private interest. When parties who are engaged in building iron ships in this country have been asked by me why they had not competed in the bids for the construction of those cruisers stated as a reason their uncertainty in regard to the steel question, and their disbelief in their capacity to provide the steel under the specifications of the Navy Department in order to meet absolutely and accurately the published demands of the Department, or to be entirely candid their want of confidence that they had an equal chance for fair treatment under their bids before the head of the Department.

I wish to say in all justice that I know of no reason for supposing that those contracts were not honestly and fairly given out and that they will not be fairly, honestly, and fully completed; but nevertheless the fact was there and that fact was one of suspicion, and it led to a great deal of angry and possibly of unjust comment. I hold it to be the part of just legislation to prevent suspicion wherever you may and give to the American people an absolute belief, so far as we can, that their interests are protected by laws carefully drawn as well as by the personal integrity of those who represent them and with whom public contracts are made.

On that last point I have satisfaction in reading the testimony of Admiral Porter, who had made some statements very mortifying in their character as to the manner in which work was conducted in the Government navy-yards, the misappropriation of public funds, the perversion of moneys, and the duplicated cost of almost everything over private contract, but when he came to speak of the creation of a navy by private contract he said:

I think five years will do the whole of it—

That is to say, in respect of preparing a proper and competent fleet:

Admiral PORTER. I think five years will do the whole of it if you will only give out the contracts and get rid of the idea which most people have that the object in the building of the ships is to make somebody rich. That is all nonsense. Our contractors are as honest as any people in the world, and are as good. They do not overreach the Government half as much as contractors do in foreign countries. If we want fine ships we must pay for them, we can not get them for nothing; and when you have them they will last fifty years. The life of an old ship was eight or nine years before you began to repair her. These splendid large iron ships are going to last forty years longer without any repairs except to the machinery. That is the advantage in having these vessels built of iron.

If it was only to show foreign nations what we could do in an emergency now, it would be worth while to set our ship-yards to work.

They laugh at us and say we can neither go to war nor defend ourselves from attack, because we can not build ships nor make guns.

Senator BUTLER. Admiral, what is the policy of foreign governments—Great Britain, Germany, France, and Italy—in building their ships? Do they build them themselves or do they let them out by contract?

Admiral PORTER. Almost all their ships are built at private establishments by contract. Italy may be excepted in the case of her largest ships.

Senator BUTLER. None built by the government?

Admiral PORTER. There may be some, but as a general rule they do not do so. As a matter of policy Great Britain encourages private ship-building yards. The salvation of the country in case of war would depend on these. We should follow the example of Great Britain.

I may also comment in this connection upon the remark made by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] in respect of the question of tariff duties controlling in all cases the cost of ship-building by the Government. In case the contractor should choose to purchase imported material upon which the average duty is assumed to be 45 per cent., if the Government paid it to him it unquestionably would receive it back, or rather it would receive it in advance at its own custom-house. If a million dollars' worth of material is to be imported by a private contractor the Government will receive $450,000 duty at that rate before the material passes into the hands of the contractor. Therefore it is as broad as it is long.

The Government pays duties to itself, and those duties are included in the cost contracted for. But I will agree that if the Government is to pay the American contractor and he builds the ship of American material alone, and the cost of that is enhanced by reason of the duty on imported material, then you have the illustration, of course, that the people of the United States pay the enhanced cost by way of giving preference or protection as it is called to their own producers instead of saving the duty by buying in the cheapest market. That is but an illustration of a very obvious fact in our present tariff system. I do not hold, however, that there is that increased cost to the American people in everything for which a private contract is made with the Government in building a ship. To the extent that I have stated it the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky seem to me to be just. Beyond that I think they are not.

I know that there have been criticisms and counter-criticisms upon the Chicago. I have read them as intelligently as I was able. A great many were too technical for my comprehension; I only saw that intelligent men were condemning the theory of the construction of that vessel; but I also know that other intelligent men sustained the theory in phrases equally strong and perhaps with arguments equally respectable. But there must come a time for decision and there must be somebody to decide. There must be some point upon which the American people finally must depend for decision. We have created an advisory board. We have given it a conscience of its own and a power independent of the Secretary of the Navy, and it is upon their recommendation, indorsed by him, that we are called upon to act; and upon all of those transactions there beats the light of a fierce public opinion.

I am glad that to-day public criticism is drawn so sharply and severely upon the question of honesty or dishonesty, corruption or the contrary, in the execution of public business. In my judgment no country will ever have any bulwark so strong, any defense so reliable, as the high personal character of its citizens.

The Navy is, the Navy ought to be, a service of personal honor of the highest grade. When any one of the gentlemen who form this advisory board or when any other officer of the Navy certifies to a fact covering much or little of money, covering facts of much or little importance, how does he do it? Under oath? No. Under the penalties of perjury? No. He does it upon the honor of a gentleman and an officer. That is the safeguard, that is the protection of the Treasury; and when that is gone may God help us and the country, for I do not think that statute laws can ever create it or can ever restore it.

I can not and I will not set my uninstructed judgment and want of personal experience in these matters against the recommendation of the advisory board, made after fuller knowledge than I can aspire or pretend to, in a line of reform which we all admit is pressing; that is to say, the creation of a competent naval force; for quite outside the chances of war or peace, every one knows that a navy such as this bill would partially create is a necessary adjunct for the prosecution of our foreign commerce. The importance and the assistance of Government vessels in the various harbors of the world to American citizens who are engaged in commerce and to American vessels which are there visiting oftentimes can scarcely be overrated. To-day the flag of the United States is seldom seen anywhere except in a home port, a vessel lying waiting probably for repairs and unable to go to sea. It ought to be exhibited by regular armed cruisers that will serve to practice the men and the officers in seamenship; it ought to be seen in every port where commerce invites the presence of our mercantile marine. It should announce and proclaim our presence as a nation among nations everywhere.

Mr. President, I am willing to trust this advisory board; I am willing to act upon their present recommendation; and I am willing to cooperate with those citizens with whom they shall fairly and openly and publicly contract; for I know that the sense of responsibility that accompanies their action will be amply sufficient to protect the interests of the American people. Woe be unto the advisory board who have been trusted as men of science and of character if their plans miscarry. Woe be unto the contractor who for the purpose of filching dishonest gain shall risk his reputation as an American mechanic before his fellow-countrymen in a case like this. Woe be unto the Secretary of the Navy or the administration that shall be found, in the face of this great public necessity and in this publicity, treating the great appropriations from the Treasury as means only for the low ends of party advantage or for the purposes of political corruption, whatever be the shape they may assume.

Sir, I say this not as a threat, it is an adjuration to honest action. I hope there is and there will be a public opinion aroused and alive in this country that shall keep every official in the land in recognition of the fact that he is scanned and closely scanned by an intelligent and an honest people; but I say there must be responsibility somewhere and an ultimate power of decision somewhere, and I believe that we have affixed it properly and I do not believe that it will be evaded. I do not think it can be evaded.

We need a fleet of armored ships as cruisers, useful in case of possible war, absolutely and instantly useful for the purposes of peace and commerce. I believe the bills that have been prepared to assist in the formation of this Navy have been carefully and properly guarded. I do not think the step is hasty or extravagant. I believe it is moderate, and that we may safely and properly accept the bill of the committee and build these ships.

I do not mean to say that there is or can be an absolute guarantee that when they have been built they shall be perfect, that they shall not be without fault. I do not say that; but I mean to say it were far better for any man a member of the advisory board, a contractor, or any man connected with the giving and creation of the contracts for these ships—better for him had he never read the law or had anything to do with the transaction than make a botch or a dishonest bungle out of this affair. But acting in the public light of opinion, guarded by careful legislation designed for the purpose of disarming suspicion or prejudice, if such there were, just or unjust, I believe it would be safe and right to go to work and build these seven ships, a very welcome and much-needed addition to the naval force, which to-day can scarcely be said to have existence at all.

For these reasons, hastily and imperfectly stated, I propose to vote in support of the bill reported by the committee and against the amendment of my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the first amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. HALE. Before the question is taken on that amendment I ask, and it must be by unanimous consent, that the amendment I proposed the other day, which I had not then at my desk, may be considered as offered. No one, I presume, will object. I did not have it at that time. I propose to add, at the end of section 1:

And said vessels shall be designed and constructed in all respects in accordance with the provisions of the naval appropriation acts of August 5, 1882, and March 3, 1883, authorizing the construction of the four steel cruisers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the end of the amendment already agreed to?

Mr. HALE. At the end of the amendment already agreed to, in section 1.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator send his amendment to the desk?

Mr. HALE. At the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware I will make it read: "in accordance with and subject to the conditions and provisions of the naval appropriation acts," &c.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Maine has the statute that he now proposes to incorporate in the bill by reference, I shall be glad if he will have it read. I have myself considered that it was altogether necessary to the perfection of the bill that it should have some reference to the existing law of a special character, and that the bill as it stands reported by the committee would be a very inefficient bill except to give the President purely arbitrary power to have these vessels built in any way he saw proper. As the Senator has for the first time brought those statutes to the view of the Senate by the terms of his bill I should be very glad to have them read, so that we may know exactly what it means.

Mr. HALE. I will have them read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine will send his proposed amendment to the Chair and the Chair will ask unanimous consent, as he desires.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Delaware has the statute in his hand.

Mr. BAYARD. I have the statute in my hand and I will ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield for the reading of the statute?

Mr. HALE. I would be very glad to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the statute referred to will be read.

Mr. BAYARD. May I state that as I understand the Senator from Maine the amendment now offered by him is to subject the contracts for the construction of these proposed seven vessels to all the conditions of the act which is now about to be read from the desk?

Mr. HALE. And also the other act of the following year. That is so. Let the Secretary read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Secretary will read the statute referred to.

The Chief Clerk read as follows from the act of March 3, 1883:

Neither of the vessels hereby authorized to be built shall be contracted for or commenced until full and complete detail drawings and specifications thereof, in all its parts, including the hull, engines, and boilers, shall have been provided or adopted by the Navy Department, and shall have been approved, in writing, by said board, or by a majority of the members thereof, and by the Secretary of the Navy; and after said drawings and specifications have been provided, adopted, and approved as aforesaid, and the work has been commenced or a contract made for it, they shall not be changed in any respect, when the cost of such change shall in the construction exceed $500, except upon the approval of said board, or a majority of the members thereof, in writing, and upon the written order of the Secretary of the Navy; and, if changes are thus made, the actual cost thereof and the damage caused thereby shall be ascertained, estimated, and determined by said board; and in any contract made pursuant to this act it shall be provided in the terms thereof that the contractor shall be bound by the determination of said board, or a majority thereof, as to the amount of the increased or diminished compensation said contractor shall be entitled to receive, if any, in consequence of such change or changes.

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to cause the said cruising vessels of war aforesaid to be provided with interior deflective steel armor, if the same, upon full investigation, shall seem to be practicable and desirable, and if the same shall be approved by said board, or a majority thereof, in writing. Before any of the vessels hereby authorized shall be contracted for or commenced the Secretary of the Navy shall, by proper public advertisement and notice, invite all engineers and mechanics of established reputation, and all reputable manufacturers of vessels, steam-engines, boilers, and ordnance, having or controlling regular establishments, and being engaged in the business, all officers of the Navy, and especially all naval constructors, steam-engineers, and ordnance officers of the Navy, having plans, models, or designs of any vessels of the classes hereby authorized, or of any part thereof, within any given period, not less than sixty days, to submit the same to said board; and it shall be the duty of said board to carefully and fully examine the same and to hear any proper explanation thereof, and to report to the Secretary of the Navy, in writing, whether, in their opinion, any such plan, model, or design, or any suggestion therein, is worthy of adoption in the construction of said vessels, their engines, boilers, or armament; and if in such construction any such plan, model, design, or suggestion shall be adopted, for the use of which any citizen not an officer of the Navy would have a just claim for compensation, the contractor shall bind himself to discharge the Government from all liability on account of such adoption and use.

Mr. HALE. Now let the Secretary read also the provision of the statute of August 5, 1882, with relation to the powers of the advisory board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator give the number of the chapter?

Mr. HALE. It is the act of August 5, 1882. The Secretary at the desk will see what the number of the chaper is.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey will state his question of order.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The amendment I had the honor to offer has been two days under discussion, a vote was about being had in the Senate, and other amendments are proposed. I wish to know whether the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Maine or by the honorable Senator from Delaware—I do not know which is the father of the amendment—is to take precedence of the amendment under consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Maine has not yet been received. The bill is still under debate. The Senator from Maine gave notice of his intention to offer a particular amendment. After it is ready to be offered, the Chair will ask the unanimous consent he desires the Chair to ask for. The Chair will state that it can only be offered at the present time by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator from New Jersey was not present when I stated that I did not, the other day, in the beginning of the discussion, when I referred to this amendment, have it with me, and that I knew that at present, except by unanimous consent, it could not come first, but that under the circumstances I presumed and hoped that no Senator would object to its being considered first, as it was an amendment in the nature of perfecting the bill, which I did not put in at the time. I ask unanimous consent, because I know very well the Senator is right in point of order.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I perhaps have an equal right to argue that my amendment is in the nature of perfecting the bill. If I had not believed it to be in the nature of perfecting the bill I should not have offered it. I certainly have no objection to anything that the Senator wishes to do as to perfecting the text of the bill; nor do I object to his giving notice now of an intended amendment which will perfect the bill. I am not an obstructionist. I only wish to have the bill proceeded with regularly. I am willing the Senator should give notice of his amendment, but I am not willing that his amendment should be acted on pending the discussion of another and more important one.

Mr. HALE. I am not asking to give notice, for I gave that at first in opening the debate upon the subject. If I had had the amendment with me then I should have put it in, as is customary on the part of a Senator having charge of a bill. I did not do that because I was subject to the infirmity that may beset any Senator, of not being able at the moment to put his hand on an amendment. If the Senator from New Jersey insists that I, in charge of the bill, shall not have the privilege now of offering the amendment as though I had offered it at the time, of course he can hinder me.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Not at all. I make no objection of that kind.

Mr. HALE. Let the Secretary read the provision in reference to the advisory board, beginning where I have marked in pencil.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Secretary will read the statute of 1882.

Mr. HALE. Which is chapter 391.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the part of the statute referred to will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows from the act of August 5, 1882:

It shall be the duty of said board to advise and assist the Secretary of the Navy, in his office or elsewhere, in all matters referred to them by him relative to the designs, models, plans, specifications, and contracts for said vessels in all their parts, and relative to the materials to be used therein and to the construction thereof, and especially relative to the harmonious adjustment, respectively, of their hulls, machinery, and armament; and they shall examine all materials to be used in said vessels, and inspect the work on the same as it progresses, and have general supervision thereof, under the direction of said Secretary. But said board shall have no power to make or enter into any contract, nor to direct or control any officer of the Navy, the chief of any bureau of the Navy, or any contractor. Neither of the vessels hereby authorized to be built shall be contracted for or commenced until full and complete detail drawings and specifications thereof, in all its parts, including the hull, engines, and boilers, shall have been provided or adopted by the Navy Department, and shall have been approved in writing by said board, or by a majority of the members thereof, and by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HALE. Now I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent to offer for consideration at this time an amendment which will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 1 as amended:

And said vessels shall be designed and constructed in all respects in accordance with and subject to the conditions and provisions of the naval appropriation acts of August 5, 1882, and March 3, 1883, authorizing the construction of four steel cruisers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this amendment?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Yes, sir; I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I am less eager to occupy the time of the Senate on this question than I was before the very acceptable and able speeches of the Senators from California and Delaware; but I venture to say something, and shall say it as compactly as I can.

I was very much pleased with the broad treatment of this case by the Senator who last spoke. I did not catch in full his reference to the Secretary of the Navy. What I did hear must have been acceptable to the Secretary's political and personal friends.

I have fancied that the newspapers, and possibly public opinion, have sometimes been unjust to that officer. For one, while rumor was busy with the probability of his appointment, I ventured to prophesy—and I am not for taking it back yet—that he would prove to be one of the ablest officers on that very illustrious roll, because of his general familiarity with business, because of his exceeding ability as a lawyer, and because of a certain special faculty that I believe him to have of extracting the essence of good judgment from the opinion of various able men in his own specialty. I still think that when his duties there shall have been closed his record will compare favorably with the record of any of the distinguished men who have preceded him in that Department.

Mr. President, there is an undeniable necessity for a navy. I was about to say that nobody denies it, but I recall the fact that even in this Chamber and within a short time it has been denied on the general ground that we are not anxious to fight anybody and nobody desires to fight us. That is a very happy condition for a nation; it is really substantially our condition now; but no human being can say how long that may last. If there be any truth in history at all, no man can tell what a day may bring forth. The millennium has not arrived yet; a sense of justice does not govern nations in all things. Whatever the prospect of peace or war, no nation fit to be called a nation, no nation assuming a place among nations, has a right to be or can be without that sanction of force which is behind all laws local, national, or international.

I spare the Senate—and I spare myself also—the humiliation of recapitulating the details of the Navy—or no navy—that we have now; but if I should go into the minutest particulars and set them forth with all the sarcasm the press freely indulges in, I should not give the world any news. There is not a government that does not know to a ton and to a gun just how little we have, how absolutely powerless we are in view of any great conflict, and I must say how completely we live by the forbearance of the world or should be living by it if we were brought to face any great controversy.

Why then, sir, shall we not build a navy? Some say there is no demand for it. I take issue; I say there is a demand. I say there is a popular demand for it. Whenever the press takes time to rest from its continual jeering at our present defenseless, I had almost said contemptible, condition it voices the true sentiment of the people in demanding that we shall address ourselves seriously and energetically to this business, without regard, beyond that due to reasonable economy and good sense, to the expense of it. We are able to have a navy, and the people will justify us in doing whatever is needed to maintain the power, the dignity, and the self-respect of the nation.

We have heard it argued that the proposed plans are not wise. They are not perfect. They are subject to all the ordinary limitations of humanity. They are not absolutely perfect. But I can not criticise them. I say that in my judgment they are wise plans, and they come at least from the wisest men that we have. They omit much, it is said. Quite right. We do not pretend, the friends of this bill do not pretend, that we are building a complete navy. The bill is but a beginning. It supplies, or proposes to supply, that which we need just now, that which will be of most immediate practical use to us, a class of swift cruisers, a class that will be found exceedingly formidable in its own peculiar line. We do not expect these vessels to attack great heavy ironclads that are built with the hope of defending themselves against thousand-pound shot; but from such these cruisers can easily run away. The reports upon the subject show for what they are intended; and of course we all know that very much more is needed. This, for the time being, is at least the very best that we can do.

We have not done much toward rebuilding our Navy since the war closed, but in the mean time all the great nations of the earth have been expending money in uncounted sums and all for our benefit, for every experiment they have made has been as much for us as for themselves.

Now, I say that in building up navies the world has reached a certain stage, has closed a chapter of development. We find many things that we would not do and ought not to do; but many general principles have been laid down to the satisfaction of all ship-builders, and it is high time for us to take advantage of this progress.

Senators tell us that the engineers do not agree to all the details laid down by the advisory board. Probably not. They never did agree and they never will agree, nor are they alone in that. The mechanics of no branch will agree precisely upon any work that is to be done; and in this matter of ship-building, from the great ironclad down to the little rowboat used in the races, there is no agreement. There is no agreement even upon the form of the very simplest two-oared or four-oared boat. There is no agreement upon the size and form of the oars, or even upon the rowlocks, or upon the stroke.

There is no unanimous agreement among builders upon the best form of heavily armored ships; no agreement upon the best form and true function of the turret, or as to the number of guns; no agreement as to the proportion of each class of ships that a navy ought to have; no agreement as to their proportionate usefulness; no agreement as to the best class of guns, their form, the precise composition best for them, or the manner of welding, boring, or rifling them. There is no exact agreement as to the composition of powder—its chemical constituents or the size of the pellets. There is no agreement as to the form of projectile.

In short, there is no absolute agreement among any fifteen or five engineers of the world upon any one of these single points, from the truck of the greatest ship down to the keel, or from the greatest ironclad down to the little two-oared wherry.

What then shall we do? Do the very best we can; take the best men we can find for the purpose and take the best they can advise. There is no agreement in some of the very great and apparently essential matters. Take a given displacement, say of 8,000 tons, and the engineers will not agree upon what shall be the length or the width or the draught of a vessel of that size. Many gentlemen here are familiar with the vessels of the White Star line and know what their extraordinary length is in comparison with their breadth. There is a reaction from that now, and for an equal displacement many of the engineers are in favor of a much broader and shorter ship. Nor can builders agree as to the exact diameter, form, and pitch of the wheel appropriate in each case. If we wait until our engineers all agree on these points, we shall wait forever.

Some tell us that we can do nothing; we are not wise enough to build good vessels for the Navy. I take issue with that. American shipbuilders have always done well. We had a larger navy during the Revolutionary war than many men are aware of. I venture to say that most of the Senators will be surprised if they shall take the trouble to hunt up the statistics with regard to the number and the efficacy of the vessels used by us during the Revolutionary war. The privateers of 1812 made themselves famous throughout the world; and our clipper ships from 1845 to 1865 were the most beautiful, the swiftest, and the most efficient ships ever put upon the waters of that particular class. And when the late tremendous conflict came upon us we again led the world and set an example. The Monitor was the first of an endless series of iron-clad ships, and the trials and tribulations that little ship went through far surpassed those that our proposed steel ships are undergoing. The ablest men, so said to be, in our Departments, the ablest scientific men called to the subject, said that the Monitor would never float away from its wharf in Brooklyn. What was the result? We were one hundred and one days in building it, working day and night, and the vessel had the honor of rendering the grandest service ever rendered by a ship to its flag. We taught the world something of the art of shipbuilding by that.

There has been waste and extravagance in the navy-yards we are told. I suppose it is true. I am a little ashamed to say that there has been a good deal of that at one time and another in the history of the country, but I am unable to look at any branch of this Government or at any branch of the service of any government in the world that is not marred by something of wrongdoing. I aver that during the tremendous five years beginning in 1861 we did as much, and did it as well, with as much science, as much honesty, and as much ability as any nation ever manifested under similar circumstances. Nobody ever did so much, and I believe nobody ever did it as well. If there shall come another emergency we shall meet it with equal ability, and in like manner shall step ahead of the world in the skill and efficiency of our work.

There is no great emergency now, no terrible contest threatening us, but there is a certain sort of crisis which calls upon us to do something. We have at least to renew our Navy. If gentlemen are to wait until they get what is absolutely perfect before they build at all, I do not see why any one of them should ever go out riding or driving until he gets a perfect horse; I do not see why he should go out shooting until he is absolutely certain that he has the best shotgun in the world; I do not see why he should eat until he is sure he has the best dinner; and I do not see why he should wear clothing until the world is pretty generally satisfied that he has the best pattern and the best material of it to wear. A nation, like an individual, must do the very best it can under the circumstances.

But we are told——

Mr. McPHERSON. Will it interfere with the Senator if I ask him a question in this connection?

Mr. HAWLEY. If it be really a question and not a speech, I have no objection to hearing it.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am not given to making speeches. The vessels the Senator is very urgent to have built are called "commerce-destroyers." The modern commercial ship is one with a speed of from eighteen to twenty miles an hour. All of the ships now being built, I may truly say, as commercial ships are those of very high speed. All we claim for these ships we propose to build as commerce-destroyers is fourteen knots an hour, and that even is questioned. How much of a commerce-destroyer will these ships be as against the commercial ships of the present time with that rate of speed?

Mr. HAWLEY. I have seen a little of the water at one time and another; I have crossed the Atlantic ten times; I never have been able to get upon or get sight of a ship that was good for eighteen or twenty knots except upon its trial trip. A vessel that can be depended upon to make fourteen knots will destroy nine-tenths of the commercial vessels afloat in the world so far as speed is concerned. That is my answer. Yes, I might say more than that, as a Senator near me suggests.

I have read the record of the best English ships upon their trial trips, and have heard from English naval officers, here and in London, and from members of the board of admiralty themselves, what they claim. They have made some magnificent records, in one or two cases running up as high as nineteen knots for a very few miles, when they selected their water and selected their weather and selected their coal and selected their engineers and everybody else stood aside and prayed. They can not repeat nineteen knots for any distance in average weather in practical service.

Mr. McPHERSON. If I may interrupt the Senator——

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Alaska and ships of her class, many of which are now being built, I think make an average speed of nearly four hundred miles per day. Certainly they have crossed the ocean in a little more than six days, which would be about seventeen miles per hour during an entire trip of 3,000 miles, through head winds, cross seas, and every obstacle that they could encounter. Now, sir, as to the Boston and Atlanta, two of the cruisers which are called "commerce-destroyers," Admiral Shufeldt, the president of the board, says:

> No ship has ever run yet for a long time at a high rate of speed with a horizontal engine. We were obliged to put horizontal engines in the Boston and Atlanta because we could not get anything else under our deck.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suppose the Senator from New Jersey speaks with some accuracy upon this subject, and when he says "miles" I suppose he means miles. Does he mean miles or knots?

Mr. McPHERSON. I only know that upon the map which I have studied, both in public schools and elsewhere, the distance between New York and Liverpool is placed at something like 3,050 miles. I know these ships make their trips; I know they advertise them, and I have been upon the ships, and have sailed four hundred and twenty-two miles per day. It would be a most amusing sight to see the Boston, or Atlanta, or the Dolphin, or the Chicago in chase after one of these ships that cross the Atlantic Ocean, which to-day carry three-fourths of the commerce between the city of New York and the city of Liverpool.

Mr. HAWLEY. Well, what the ordinary careless writer says about distance is one thing and what the sailors and the chart-makers say is quite another. Eighteen knots would be very nearly twenty-one miles; eighteen miles would be, say, fifteen and one-half knots. There is quite a difference in the statements. I do not deny the great speed of a few ships of the class referred to.

We are not attempting to make an absolutely perfect navy. We are not pretending that it can fight the most heavily-armored vessels or that it can run down all the swift ones. I say what I said before, that as a commerce-destroyer a vessel that can be depended upon to make fourteen knots, which would be over sixteen statute miles an hour, could be depended upon to overtake and destroy nine-tenths of the vessels engaged in commerce in the world; and I might make it stronger, as suggested by Senators around me, and say nineteen-twentieths, but I allow the Senator from New Jersey one-tenth.

Another objection to our undertaking this work is that John Roach wants to build the ships. It is a powerful name to conjure with, sir. Is it a crime that John Roach wants to build them? Is he a public enemy? I wish there were one hundred men who were anxious to build the ships, and who had the skill, the ship-yards, and the capital to do it. Shall we insist upon finding somebody that is unwilling to build them? Shall we wait until nobody can be found who wishes to build them or can be compelled to build them?

There is one more suggestion, not made in precisely so many words, but substantially made here, that we should wait until a Democratic administration can undertake this work. Suppose gentlemen formulate that—put it plainly in words, and make it known, and go to the country with it—"We will not agree to build a ship, no matter what the national necessities or honor may call for, until it can be built by direction of a Democratic Secretary of the Navy." Will that be patriotic? Will that be acceptable to the people of this country? It has virtually been said here. I can not believe that it governs the vote and feelings of any single Senator here, and therefore I do not attempt to characterize it. That is not the temper of Americans generally—whether Democrats or Republicans or Whigs or whatever they call themselves—whether in preparing for war or engaging in war.

Why, sir, substantially the platform of those who have been opposing this bill is this: "We do not know what to build; we are afraid of John Roach; and we will wait until the Democrats come into power." On the other hand, we affirm the absolute necessity to our national honor and self-respect of a navy. We affirm, humiliating as it is, that on the water we are practically defenseless; we affirm that we have officers, scientists and mechanics as able as any, and we affirm that there is a popular and universal demand for a navy.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, upon what will the first question be taken? The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is clearly a divisible amendment, I take it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey has proposed several amendments, in a parliamentary sense. The question will first be taken on the one in line 4, to strike out "seven" and insert "four."

Mr. HALE. So I thought. As the Senator has declined to allow my amendment to be voted upon first, I will wait until his amendment to line 8 is reached, when I will, with the leave of the Chair, move to substitute my amendment for his. Perhaps I had better move to lay the Senator's amendment on the table, as under the present rules that can be done, giving notice that then I will offer the amendment which has been read at the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to lay the first amendment of the Senator from New Jersey on the table. That, under the present rules, the Chair believes to be in order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg permission of the Senate to read three lines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to lay on the table is not open to debate.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was speaking from my general recollection on the subject as to the proportion of very fast steamers. Just as I closed my colleague handed me this document, the report of the committee, in which I find that Admiral Shufeldt says:

> We must remember that there is a very small proportion of fast steamers in the world; a very large proportion, 90 per cent., do not go over ten or eleven knots. It is only in the North Atlantic that there is such high speed.

Mr. HALE. Under the ruling of the Chair that a motion to lay on the table would not carry the entire amendment of the Senator from New Jersey I would as lief the question should be taken, if it can be now, on the first branch of his amendment, striking out "seven" and inserting "four."

I only wish before the question is put to say a word on a single point, that raised yesterday as to the cost of these ships by reason of duties paid upon steel. That question of the tariff I do not think properly comes in here; but the statement of the Senator from Kentucky that these ships would cost 45 per cent. more than if we imported the materials with which to construct them is one that does pertinently come in here. So far from these ships costing, at the rates that they are contracted for, 45 per cent. more than if we imported the materials under the present tariff, made as they are of American steel and American materials in their hulls and machinery, investigation shows the following results: The cost of hull and machinery of the Chicago, of 4,500 tons displacement, is $198 per ton; the cost of the Boston, of 3,000 tons displacement, is $205 per ton; the cost of Her Britannic Majesty's ship Leander, of 3,750 tons, an average between these two, built in England of English steel, is $200 per ton, almost an average between the cost of the Chicago and the Boston. With that I leave that statement, showing that we get these ships as cheap as England with her own steel gets her ships.

There were other things that I had purposed to allude to in summing up this debate; but they have been so much better stated by the Senator from California and the Senator from Connecticut and especially by the Senator from Delaware that I do not deem that it would be fitting or in good taste for me to take up more time. I hope we may now have a vote on the several amendments of the Senator from New Jersey, and when we come to his amendment providing conditions I shall move to substitute the amendment that I sent a little while ago to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON], to strike out in line 4 the word "seven" and insert "four." On this amendment the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNA (when Mr. CAMDEN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY], who is absent from the Chamber. If he were present, he would vote "nay." I should vote for the amendment.

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. MITCHELL's name was called). I am requested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] to state that owing to sickness he is not able to be in his seat and may not be for some days. He wishes to be excused, and he is paired without further announcement with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. PENDLETON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] on this question.

Mr. SAWYER (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GARLAND. My colleague [Mr. WALKER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. BROWN (after having voted in the affirmative). I withdraw my vote. I understand the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], if here, would vote "nay," and I voted "yea." I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. COCKRELL (after having voted in the affirmative). Since I voted I am reminded of the fact that yesterday or the day before I had a pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. I understand he is still confined to his house by sickness. I withdraw my vote, and announce that if he were present he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—17.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the next amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 9, 10, and 11, strike out the following words:

One cruiser of 4,500 tons displacement, one cruiser of 3,000 tons, one dispatch vessel of 1,500 tons.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] will be read:

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add, as a new section:

SEC. 3. That the gunboats, steel ram, and torpedo-boats authorized to be built under sections 1 and 2 of this act shall be built under complete plans and specifications to be furnished by the Navy Department, except the gunboat to be built on plans to be furnished by the Admiral of the Navy; and such building shall be under contracts with the lowest responsible bidder or bidders, made after at least sixty days' advertisement published in five of the leading newspapers of the United States, inviting proposals for building said vessels, subject to all such rules, regulations, superintendence, and provisions as to bonds and security for the due completion of the work as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe; and no such vessel shall be accepted unless completed in strict conformity with the contract, and no contract shall be made until all the general plans, detailed or working drawings, and specifications for the complete work be made.

Mr. HALE. I suggested that I would offer my amendment as a substitute for that; but I see it will come in more harmoniously with the text. So if the Senate shall choose to vote this down then I will offer my amendment.

Mr. SEWELL. I wish the Senator from Maine would allow the amendment I offered to be taken up before his amendment comes in, because the adoption of his amendment would preclude mine, and I desire a vote on my amendment.

Mr. HALE. Let us take a vote on this amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Let the amendment be reported.

Mr. HALE. It has just been reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey on the right of the Chair [Mr. MCPHERSON], which has just been reported.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask that it be read again.

Mr. SEWELL. I think the amendment just reported is the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the question on the remaining amendment of the Senator from New Jersey on the right of the Chair? Is it still pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is. The question is on agreeing to it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. What do I understand my colleague to offer?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's colleague proposes to offer an amendment after this shall have been disposed of.

Mr. HALE. I will move, then, to substitute my amendment for this. That will bring up the question directly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine proposes to amend the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey as follows——

Mr. HALE. By substituting——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By striking out the same and inserting what will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And said vessels, rams, and boats shall be designed and constructed in all respects in accordance with and subject to the conditions and provisions of the naval appropriation acts of August 5, 1882, and March 3, 1883, authorizing the construction of four steel cruisers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on this amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey on the right of the Chair, by striking out the whole of the original amendment and inserting what has just been read.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senator from Maine to withhold this amendment and take the questions in the order in which they come. The adoption of this would preclude the offering of my amendment practically.

Mr. HALE. I can not do that, because my amendment comes in as germane to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. I have not the control of that. When the vote comes up on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] my amendment must be put in, because it is the same kind of subject-matter, only mine goes further in its restrictions and I think will be more satisfactory even to the Senator from New Jersey than his own, and so I have to put it in now. I do not control it.

Mr. SEWELL. But it entirely does away practically with my amendment, which provides a different mode for the construction of these vessels.

Mr. HALE. That the Senator must settle with his colleague. I am moving to substitute mine for the amendment of his colleague.

Mr. PLATT. Let the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] be reported for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read for information if there be no objection. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 3. That the vessels authorized by this act shall be constructed at one or more of the most suitable navy-yards of the Government, under the supervision of the proper officers of the Navy: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may be authorized by the President to procure the machinery for said vessels from parties engaged in the business of constructing naval machinery, the lowest responsible bidder to be accepted, after three months' advertisement in the principal newspapers of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and San Francisco, payments to be made as the work progresses; but at no time shall it amount to within 25 per cent. of the value of the work and material, which amount of the contract price shall be retained by the Secretary of the Navy until final completion and acceptance of the contract.

Mr. SEWELL. Would it be in order to move to amend the pending amendment by this amendment or substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is in order to move to substitute the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey for the amendment of the Senator from Maine, which is regarded as a separate proposition.

Mr. SEWELL. Then I move to substitute my amendment. I present this amendment as an economical business proposition. It involves the construction of the hulls of these vessels in the navy-yards of the country. There is a general idea that the navy-yards of this country have not got the plant, the machinery for the construction of an ordinary hull of an iron or steel vessel. I say that is a mistake; but if I am not correct in that, it requires a very small outlay of money to enable us to construct the hulls of vessels in the navy-yards the same as is done in the different private yards of the country. The largest private yards in the country construct not alone the hulls, but the machinery, which latter requires a very much larger outlay of plant and money than the mere putting together of the plates, ribs, kelsons, &c., of the hulls. I doubt if there is more than a couple of million dollars invested in the largest ship-yard in the country. The mere construction of the hulls in the navy-yards is what I propose, and as an evidence of what it would cost I will merely state that the last yard established on the Delaware, where all these private yards are, probably commenced with a capital of $300,000, and it now has several iron vessels on the stocks; so that a small amount of appropriation, the cost of one of these smallest vessels, would be sufficient to start a plant in one of our navy-yards to construct a hull.

I provide that the Secretary of the Navy may be authorized by the President to contract for the machinery, because it takes a larger plant, and we can not expect to do all these things at the same time. But there is no question that the hull, which is a very simple matter of mechanics, simply laying up plate after plate on the ribs, like the ordinary boiler of an engine, and riveting them, can be put together in the Government yards, and all the material that was needed could be obtained by contract, the plates, and the forgings, and the castings, just as John Roach, or Harlan & Hollingsworth, or any other manufacturers, get them. They do not manufacture them in their own yards, they do not do it with their own plant, but they buy them at so much a pound.

In offering this proposition I am guided by my business experience. The great corporations of this country pursue the course of having a plant in readiness to do their work. If it is not large enough, if it is not sufficient for all they want, they make a pattern which governs the price and governs what they have to pay to others. If the Government had one or two of the navy-yards started with a plant of this kind it would control the market for that class of work, it would be able to dictate to the manufacturers instead of the manufacturers dictating to it. If the Senate expect that the three or four constructors of hulls and machinery located on the Delaware are to bid in competition for work of this kind for a long period they are mistaken. These business men look out for their own interests.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SEWELL. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire the Senator to state if he can by name what navy-yards, as now existing and equipped, are in a condition to construct these vessels, or any of them.

Mr. SEWELL. The League Island navy-yard, with a very small amount of money for a plant, could construct these vessels outside of the machinery. It would require a large amount of money for the machinery.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is that the only one?

Mr. SEWELL. Norfolk could do it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What other?

Mr. SEWELL. Mare Island could do the same. Pensacola I am not familiar with; but I know that the yards at Mare Island, Norfolk, and League Island could do it.

It is a folly to suppose that the three or four manufacturers in this country are going to bid against each other very long when they can combine and get the work altogether. The Government ought to be able to control it, and it can only control it by having a plant of its own. Even if it only makes one vessel of the kind, it can say what it shall cost.

I am in favor of the construction of war vessels. I am in favor of this bill. I will go heartily for it. I will vote for it, whether they are to be constructed at the navy-yards or at private yards. I recognize the fact that there is an absolute necessity for a navy. I recognize a fact which I have not heard any Senator on this floor mention, that within a very few years we shall be face to face with the completion of a canal between the Atlantic and Pacific, when we shall have to meet the question as to who shall control it. I for one am of the opinion that the American people expect the Congress of the United States to see to it that no foreign control shall be had over a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific, between the east and west shores of this country. I am in favor of maintaining the manifest destiny of this nation by the finest ship, with the greatest gun, and with sufficient metal to carry it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair on considering the seventeenth new rule is of opinion that the Chair was in error in holding that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] is now in order. The Chair finds that the seventeenth rule only provides for motions to strike out and insert as two separate questions. So the Chair must put the question on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey on the right of the Chair [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. HALE. I only wish to say upon that that I have endeavored to make it so sweeping that it would include all the restrictions thrown around the building of these vessels by both the act of 1882 and the act of 1883. The main thing upon which the act of 1882 is needed is the control or veto and recommendation of the advisory board; that is provided for in the statute of 1882. But the general provisions for the building, the advertisement and all those details, are found in the act of 1883, which the Senator from Delaware had read. If anybody can perfect the amendment and make it better I shall be very glad to have that done, but I have tried to make it as sweeping as I could.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] has introduced his amendment. Whether we shall ever build an iron or steel ship in a navy-yard of the United States or not, we should equip our navy-yards and be in readiness to do that thing. I have not a very extensive familiarity with the navy-yards. Some of them I have examined with a good deal of care. I have information, though, from constructors and others who are informed, that it will require a very small additional outlay to put these yards in condition to build steel or iron ships—not merely the hulls, but also the machinery if we choose to do so.

Some three or four years ago a bill passed Congress authorizing the dredging of the bay of Mobile, and it required that the contract should be let out to the lowest bidder. The contract was accordingly let out to the lowest bidder, and 22½ cents per cubic yard was the lowest bid that could be obtained for that dredging work. Luckily the contract was suspended. The engineer in charge refused to accept it because he thought the bid exorbitant; still it was the lowest bid that he could get. When the next appropriation bill came up on an amendment moved by myself that the Secretary of War might have the option of doing the work at the Government expense the biddings were reopened and let again, and that work was done and is being done to-day at 11½ cents a yard, a saving of nearly 100 per cent. on the amount of the bid that was put in for that Government work. And we actually saved enough out of that appropriation to go on without any increase of appropriations and do twice the work we should have done but for that provision in the law.

The principle advocated by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] is not only a sound business principle, but it is a necessary principle in the dealings of the Government of the United States with its contractors wherever it may be made available. We can not afford to dispense with that principle in our public contracts; that is to say, wherever the Government can do the work it shall be at the option at least of the President or Secretary of the Navy, or whoever may be the proper person to let these contracts to the lowest bidder, to do the work under the direction and control of the Government.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, no evidence has been brought to the Senate by this committee to negative the proposition that we are entirely able to build these ships in our own navy-yards. We have a number of them, very important yards, built with great care and at enormous expense, and in these yards is treasured up a vast amount of machinery, and the machinery is continually being renewed. Some of the most expensive machinery in the world is found in the American navy-yards and some of the best.

Now, let me ask the chairman of the Naval Committee whether or not the boilers for these steel cruisers which we are having built under contract are not being constructed at our navy-yard here in Washington. Is not that the fact?

Mr. HALE. What is that?

Mr. MORGAN. I ask whether or not the boilers of the steel cruisers we are now building are being constructed at the Washington navy-yard?

Mr. HALE. All the hulls are being constructed outside of the navy-yards. Some of the machinery, it is believed, and the fitting-out, the boats, &c., can be provided to a limited extent in the navy-yards. As to the boilers, I can not say where they are being constructed. I do not believe they are being constructed in the navy-yards, though.

Mr. MORGAN. I have recently examined a number of new steam-boilers that are being built at the Washington navy-yard, and I was informed that they were for these cruisers, and certainly they are most admirable specimens of workmanship, very beautiful, and they are an honor to American mechanism and American enterprise. Some of them are built on new models—very admirable machinery.

As I remarked the other day, we have just built a very long, powerful, splendid steel gun at the navy-yard at Washington. Now, we have no steam-hammer in the United States that is capable of handling and welding, compacting I will say, an ingot or a bolt of steel large enough to band the gun that has just been completed at the navy-yard; consequently we had to send to Great Britain for the ingot, but the work since that time has been done in this navy-yard, including every part of it except the few bands, two or three of the largest-sized bands, which I am informed were made at Chester, Pa.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will allow me. I have been examining the contract of the builders who have undertaken the building of these vessels and fittings, and I find that it not only includes the engines, but the boilers, and that they are being made now by the contractors, and not by the Government.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. The boilers the Senator has seen must be for some other ships.

Mr. MORGAN. It makes no difference; they are steel boilers of the very first class of workmanship and of the largest capacity made at this navy-yard, and there is a gun that has been constructed in the navy-yard by machinery which is there, turned down, rifled, the breech-block fitted in, and every part of it made entirely complete; a very beautiful instrument. I suppose it must be some thirty feet in length. It will be a very good excursion for the Senate of the United States to take to its own navy-yard here in Washington city to gain some information about the capability of the American Government in its own navy-yards to construct this work.

Sir, there can be no doubt at all that every one of these ships can be built even at the Washington navy-yard, with the addition of some two or three hundred thousand dollars for the machinery that may be needed for the peculiar work in building the hulls of steel ships or the machinery of a steel ship. You have got ample dock-room; the scaffolding room of course is ample; and there is no reason why at that navy-yard as good a ship can not be built as can be built at Mr. John Roach's or at Mr. Cramp's ship-yard. There is no difficulty in the question at all.

I remember, if you will allow me to recall some events in respect of American enterprise, one which was wonderfully successful at the Norfolk navy-yard. When the war closed the Norfolk navy-yard by a blockade a ship was found there that was captured by the confederates, and with the appliances that they found in that navy-yard and with railroad iron they built the first monitor that was ever floated in the sea and one of the best. She had very weak engines, though, compared with her weight; but there can not be any doubt that the Merrimac inaugurated a thorough revolution in the building of armored ships, and that from the date of her launching and going into action has come forth this wonderful revolution in steam-enginery and also in naval warfare.

I therefore take it that you may take the same navy-yard without a blockade and with the resources that the Government of the United States can afford and you can build any ship, an armored ship, to say nothing of a steam steel-hull ship or iron-hull ship at the navy-yard at Norfolk as well as you can build it on the Clyde. You can do the same thing in Boston; you can do it also at League Island; you can do it at Mare Island; you can do it at Pensacola; you can do it anywhere where you have got a navy-yard. This ignoring of our navy-yards merely because somebody wants to break them down and lock them up is not in accordance with the sort of wisdom Congress should exert and employ in the conduct of public affairs.

No, sir. I protest that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] is right in his proposition, that it would be a great economy, if you please, to equip one yard, if no more, so that those gentlemen (there are only two of them in the United States, Mr. Cramp and Mr. Roach) who come in to bid for the building of ships will be confronted with the proposition, "If you do not choose to build them at fair living wages, the Government of the United States will build them." Merely for the sake of getting fair bids for this work we ought at least to equip one of our navy-yards and have it ready on all occasions for the building of these ships.

Some Senators here have spoken in a very elevated strain, and one that I applaud very highly, in favor of building American ships by the assistance of American workmen, out of American material, officering them with American officers, and manning them with American seamen. That is a very delightful thought, Mr. President, but let us not boast ourselves of being able to do all these things when we are actually importing our guns from abroad. Without a gun your ship is of no value. Without a better gun than Great Britain has your ship will go down into the middle of the sea whenever she meets an iron-clad or a steel-clad man-of-war. Guns of the very best quality and a speed superior to the speed of the ships of any other country are the only things that we have in reach of us to-day upon which to found even the idea of a successful navy or a successful cruiser. We go abroad without any qualms of compunction at all and we buy guns, or if we do not buy them made up, we buy the steel, the breech pieces, and all that is needed for the purpose of making the gun. We transport them to our own shores and make them up at an enormous outlay.

This boasted American sentiment would be very much better if it were practiced upon more and talked about less. The model of the breech-loading gun, the breech bolt that is being used by all the great military and naval powers in Europe, was first made in the South Boston Iron Works in Boston by an American mechanic. I believe he got his patent upon it here; I am quite sure he did. He submitted it to a board of naval officers and to a board of Army officers, and they indignantly rejected it. He went abroad, where there was more freedom of opinion and less restraint and combination and restriction from the mere association of officers together, which is sometimes called a ring, and there this American mechanic received encouragement; his invention was patented there; it has been accepted by the great maritime and warlike powers of the earth, and we go there now and buy it ready-made and bring it home and put it in the breeches of our guns. That is the way that American genius and American invention and American labor are treated in this American country of which so many loud boasts are made on the floor of the Senate and in respect of which so very little is ever done!

Sir, you have but two institutions in this country to-day that furnished you guns during the war. They are at South Boston and at West Point. When you closed the war you had a better armament of guns than any nation in the world. Now you have none to compare with any other nation, any great power to say the least of it. Why is this? It is because invention, practical experiment has been conducted by other governments and they have improved upon our plans and our systems to that extent that we are left entirely in the lurch and we are now in a crippling way trying to catch up with them. But how do we go about it? We want a navy. Why, sir, do we want a Quaker navy armed with Quaker guns? By no means. If we must have a navy, let us have a fighting navy, one at least capable of fighting; and yet you can not put an American gun that you can trust on board of any ship you may build—I care not where you build it—we have no gun establishment in the United States that is at all equal to the necessity, or the emergency, as it may be, of building guns for a navy or for your seacoast defense. We are in a great hurry about building ships, in order, I suppose, that we may have an opportunity to buy the guns to put upon their decks from some foreign country; and yet my friend from Florida is greatly alarmed lest we might go abroad to find some part of a ship we might build manufactured in a foreign country or to find the material of which to manufacture it here.

The Government of the United States is a free-trader on this subject. As a government, as a personality, as a corporation, it is a free-trader, because it says you shall not tax any material that is brought in from abroad for the use of the Government of the United States. That is free trade. The act stands upon the statute-book, and the Senator from Kentucky has some reasonable desire that that act shall be put into force by the Government and in favor of the Government; but the very moment the Senator gets up and quotes the free-trade legislation of a Republican Congress he is swarmed with objections and even taunted on the floor of the Senate because he makes reference to the state of the law as it exists. How are you going to get the benefit of this provision by making a contract with an American citizen or any other citizen to make ships here out of materials produced in the United States or imported into the United States? The only way you can get the benefit of it is under the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]; build your hulls in your navy-yards where you have the power and capacity to build them, and then let the Government bring its material in without taxation if it finds it necessary to go abroad to get it, or if it does not find it necessary to go abroad to get it the Government can go to those who produce steel, timber, or any other thing that enters into a ship from the inside of it to the paint on the outside, and the Government can say, "We can not pay you the prices you ask for the material, because we can buy it in foreign markets where it is made cheaper and bring it in without duty." In that way the Government economizes very greatly; but if these ships are to be built by private contract alone, then the Government can never avail itself of that chance, for the reason, of course, that Mr. Roach, who makes the steel out of which these ships are to be built, or Mr. Cramp, who buys it from his neighbor, or whoever may be the contractor for the building of these ships, in putting in his bids must necessarily take into account the fact that the price is raised by whatever influence the tariff may have in raising prices; he puts that into his bid, and we have to pay for it notwithstanding the law upon the statute-book that materials used in building a ship may be imported by the United States Government entirely free of duty. I therefore for that reason would also favor the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Now let us see what the committee have offered us or shown to us in opposition to what I have said in respect to our ability to build ships in our navy-yards. All that I can find touching this very important question in the report of the committee and the evidence which accompanies it is the following on page 94, being in Admiral Porter's testimony:

Senator BUTLER. Admiral, what is the policy of foreign governments—Great Britain, Germany, France, and Italy—in building their ships. Do they build them themselves or do they let them out by contract?

Admiral PORTER. Almost all their ships are built at private establishments by contract. Italy may be excepted in the case of her largest ships.

The Admiral might have added that there is no requirement in the European policy that the ship shall be built within the borders of the territory of the state which may buy her. You may go anywhere and buy a ship in Europe except in Italy.

Senator BUTLER. None built by the Government?

Admiral PORTER. There may be some, but as a general rule they do not do so. As a matter of policy Great Britain encourages private ship-building yards. The salvation of the country in case of war would depend on these. We should follow the example of Great Britain.

I concur in that. We should follow that example.

Senator JONES. Is it so in Great Britain?

Admiral PORTER. They are built by private individuals. Their navy-yards are fitting yards. They fit out vessels in the navy-yards, but they are built by the best builders in the country, and that policy ought to be pursued in this country. As I said before, when war comes then we would have these great ship-building places with their plant which had accumulated during peace. The navy-yards should be used altogether for fitting purposes. I am opposed to building ships in Government yards.

Senator BUTLER. Is there a navy-yard in the United States that could build a ship out and out now?

Admiral PORTER. There is. I had one built in a navy-yard once, and I assure you when I got through with her I weighed about forty pounds less than I did when I started; but we could build these in case of necessity.

There is positive proof from Admiral Porter that the navy-yards can build a ship, and I would not care at all if many naval officers should lose forty pounds apiece in building ships, for they would get rid of a good deal of superfluous flesh and fat which they are attempting to dance off like a lot of dudes in the city of Washington. I should be very glad to have that reduction of the superfluous flesh of the naval officers by finding them some manly and honest employment in the construction of our ships at our navy-yards.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. SEWELL. In connection with the reported testimony of the Admiral, I would add that the Governments of England, Germany, and Italy have the plant necessary to construct and do construct vessels when they find it more profitable. They have the plant ready at all times to do it.

Mr. MORGAN. So I understand the testimony of Admiral Porter.

Mr. President, I have some observations that I desire to submit upon this bill further on. I will not detain the Senate this evening, however, by doing so. I will wait until an amendment comes up which I have had the honor to suggest that I would offer at the proper time.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is aware that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] is not now up, on the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MORGAN. I know.

Mr. HALE. I should like to have a vote on the other amendment, and after that is disposed of, of course the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] will come up.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that; and I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from New Jersey. After it is provided, if it shall be so ordered by the Senate, that these ships shall be built in accordance with existing law, as is the purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Maine, then I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that he can say, by putting it in the alternative, "or the President shall have the right to have these ships built in any of the navy-yards."

Mr. SEWELL. I think the existing law gives that right now.

Mr. HALE. The present law provides that.

Mr. SEWELL. I want it mandatory.

Mr. HALE. The Senator goes further and wants to exclude private yards. The present law leaves it discretionary with the President that he can utilize the navy-yards so far as it can be done with advantage to the Government.

Mr. MORGAN. After we shall have reaffirmed the present law by adopting the amendment of the Senator from Maine the present law would apply to this case.

Mr. HALE. Let me read to the Senator the part of the statute I referred to as embodying the conduct of the building of these vessels:

Provided, That he shall utilize the national navy-yards, with the machinery, tools, and appliances belonging to the Government there in use in the building of said ships, or any parts thereof, as fully and to as great an extent as the same can be done with advantage to the Government.

Under that the President can order half, or all, or two-thirds, or none of these ships to be built in the public yards.

Mr. MORGAN. I see now that I was not fully informed about it. I wish to remark just here that the Naval Committee have presented us a bill which in itself is a mere skeleton. It did not in the outset refer to any of these statutes. It seems to me the committee would have done very much better if it had written the bill out in extenso and incorporated in this measure all the provisions relating to the building of these ships; but I stand informed by the Senator from Maine, and of course I say the President should have the option.

Mr. HALE. I accept the reproach of the Senator from Alabama. It would have been better if in reporting the bill the amendment had been put in that I have offered now; but it was referred to at once on the opening of the discussion and did not get in before. I do not think that is an infrequent thing in the course of business in the Senate.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the Senator from Alabama to yield to me. I desire a short executive session, and if the Senator from Alabama will yield the floor and permit me to make the motion, I shall do so.

Mr. HALE. Let me appeal to the Senator from Georgia to let us have a vote on this amendment and have it out of the way, and then let the other question come up.

Mr. BROWN. If there be no further discussion I will consent; but it is getting late and I do not know that we are ready for a vote.

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield for a vote on the committee's proposition.

Mr. HALE. I presume there will be no yeas and nays called on it and that there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator from Georgia will withdraw his motion for one minute, I should like to have a vote on my amendment.

Mr. BROWN. If there is to be no debate, I have no objection and withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey on the right of the Chair [Mr. MCPHERSON] as amended on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL. I now desire to have a vote on my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey proposes an amendment which will be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is to add as an additional section:

SEC. 3. That the vessels authorized by this act shall be constructed at one or more of the most suitable navy-yards of the Government, under the supervision of the proper officers of the Navy: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may be authorized by the President to procure the machinery for said vessels from parties engaged in the business of constructing naval machinery, the lowest responsible bidder to be accepted, after three months' advertisement in the principal newspapers of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and San Francisco, payments to be made as the work progresses; but at no time shall it amount to within 25 per centum of the value of the work and material, which amount of the contract price shall be retained by the Secretary of the Navy until final completion and acceptance of the contract.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire simply to have the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, if in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It proposes to add to the amendment:

That the construction of said vessels shall be apportioned between the following navy-yards under the direction of the President of the United States, to wit: League Island, Mare Island, Norfolk, Pensacola, Washington, and Brooklyn.'

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HALE and Mr. JONES of Florida addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Florida in support of his amendment, as the practice is.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not intend to go into any extended remarks on this subject; but if the spirit of the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is to be carried out I want it equitably executed. He proposes in his amendment to leave the selection of the navy-yard or navy-yards to the President and designates no place; so that under his amendment it would be in the power of the Secretary of the Navy to fix upon any yard he might think proper for the construction of all these ships.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator from Florida has been trusting the Secretary of the Navy for the last few days; can he not trust him further?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I say that it would not be a wise thing to do. The Secretary of the Navy is an honest man, but as I said last year when the question of repairing ships was up, there is some power that I would not trust to anybody. The Senator knows that I am just as willing to go as far in the direction of giving the Secretary of the Navy power as anybody here. I have never held——

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BLAIR. I appeal to the courtesy of the Senator from Florida to permit an amendment of his amendment including the navy-yard at Portsmouth, N. H.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; that ought to be included!

Mr. BLAIR. And also at Charlestown, Mass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has the floor and must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. For what purpose?

Mr. BROWN. I yielded to the Senator from New Jersey with the understanding that when he was through I should move an executive session.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SEWELL. I again appeal to the Senator from Georgia to allow a vote on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BROWN. There is no probability of getting a vote if I should again withdraw the motion at the request of the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not open to debate. The Senator from Georgia must either insist upon his motion or withdraw it. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 28, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DEATH OF HERR LASKER.

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DEUSTER. I desire to present to the House a resolution of thanks from the executive committee of the Liberal Union of the German Parliament, in response to the resolution of condolence passed by this House on the death of Dr. Eduard Lasker. With the resolution I present also a translation of the original, which I desire to have read to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think from the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin that he presents a question of privilege. If there be no objection, the resolution to which the gentleman refers will be read.

There was no objection.

Mr. DEUSTER. I desire to state that this resolution was addressed to the House of Representatives, and would have been presented by the Speaker had not the rules prevented him from doing so. I now ask for the reading of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

BERLIN, January 27, 1884.

To the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned executive committee of the Liberal Union has the honor to express, at the request of all its members who are to-day present from the various parts of the German Empire, to the House of Representatives at Washington its warmest thanks for the resolution which they have passed in honor of Eduard Lasker, its late leader and friend.

The Liberal Union combines with this acknowledgment of its thanks the most heartfelt wishes for the welfare and prosperity of the powerful and progressive United States of America, and for the strengthening and further development of the mutual friendship between both nations.

The executive committee of the Liberal Union:

L. BAMBERGER.
RUECKERT.
v. FORCKENBECK.
K. SCHRADER.
G. v. BUNSEN.
FRIEDRICH KAPP.

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Speaker, this resolution of thanks speaks for itself. It is occasioned by an event which has aroused surprise and indignation on both sides of the Atlantic. It involves a protest against the arbitrary action which, according to all reports, has been manifested by the chancellor of the German Empire in the treatment, by withholding them from the Reichstag, of the resolutions recently passed by the American Congress on the death of Dr. Lasker. It is a condemnation of the discourteous, if not contemptuous, attitude which Prince Bismarck has seen fit to assume toward the principal legislative body of a friendly nation. It is an appeal from the other side of the ocean for the liberty of speech and a plea for a continuance of the amicable relations which have so long existed between Germany and the United States. It is, moreover, a declaration from the German people that the act of their chancellor is not their act and that it can never be their act, based as it is upon the principle of the one-man power.

The Liberal Union is a representative body made up from the German people, and it reflects their feelings and sentiments concerning the action of the American Congress on the occasion of the passing away of one of the greatest modern German statesmen.

True, the resolutions of this House referring to the death of Dr. Lasker may have been faulty in construction; the phraseology used may not have been such as would have been employed by one who was not born and reared beneath the flag of the free; by one who in his youth or early manhood had felt the influence of a monarchical government; of a land in which social and, in a great measure, political position is a birthright more than an achievement or reward for merit.

The resolutions, I repeat, may possibly not have been commensurate with the requirements of the occasion; but if they were faulty, the fault is chargeable to the head rather than the heart of their framer. They were expressive of the condolence of one legislative body and the people back of it with another legislative body and people upon whom the heavy hand of death had been laid and from whom one of their brightest jewels had been plucked.

From the cisatlantic standpoint death breaks down all political barriers, and in the presence of the open grave the universal fatherhood of God and common brotherhood of man is the inspiration of the hour. The same is true of the Germans as a people, and if they are misrepresented by a man in powerful place, they have no other method of setting themselves right before the world than the course adopted by the executive committee of the Liberal Union.

In presenting this communication, in my official place as a member of this body, as a native of Germany, and as an adopted citizen of the United States, I desire to express my earnest conviction that the action of the Liberal Union is a true index of the feelings of united Germany, and that the action of Prince Bismarck will not rise above the dignity of a matter of personal vexation and will in no way affect the kindly relations now existing between the two countries.

Mr. Speaker, it may be premature to criticise the action of Prince Bismarck, in the absence of official information that the resolutions of this House have been returned. When such official information is in the possession of this body, I shall, however, take the opportunity to show wherein the resolutions were timely and proper.

Mr. KASSON addressed the Chair.

Mr. GUENTHER. I move, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has been recognized.

Mr. KASSON. Under the circumstances I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin for a few moments.

Mr. GUENTHER. I would like to have about five minutes.

Mr. KASSON. I will yield that length of time.

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to have the letter which has just been read from the Clerk's desk given the very widest possible publicity.

There seems to exist an impression at present in this country, at least among a portion of our citizens, that the people of Germany are hostile toward this country and its institutions. I venture to say, sir, that this is by no means the case. I deny most emphatically that the letter of Prince Bismarck to the German embasssador at this capital, returning the Lasker resolution, reflects the sentiments of the German people. They do not approve of his discourtesy and lack of tact as exhibited in that note; neither do they indorse his autocratic action regarding the prohibition of American products. They know, and so does everybody who has watched his movements during his career as chancellor of the German Empire, that, like his march to Canossa, his actions are almost always prompted by a desire to gain the temporary support of certain minor factions by catering for the time being to their notions and prejudices under cover of artful pretexts and shrewd sophisms.

Last summer I spent three months in Germany, and I became thoroughly convinced of the fact that an overwhelming majority of the German people entertained none but the kindest feelings for us, our institutions, our prosperity and growth as a nation. The sentiments expressed in the letter which has just been read reflect the popular opinion in all parts of the German Empire. One of the signers of that letter, Mr. Bunsen, visited the United States last summer. Another, Dr. Friedrich Kapp, a member of the German Parliament, is well known in this country, of which he has been a resident for many years. He has traversed it from one end to the other, and is familiar with our people, our institutions, and our ideas. He is a man of calm and mature judgment; and I fully believe that the sentiments expressed in this letter over the signature of a number of men of note, several of whom are members of the German Parliament, were framed with an intelligent understanding of the motives that prompted the resolution in question, and of the kindly and courteous feeling of this House that adopted them toward an eminent citizen of Germany, a member of the German Parliament, who unfortunately died upon our shores before he could again take his seat and continue his usefulness in the national legislature of his country—a country which he loved so well and for whose welfare and advancement he labored during all of his life.

Some of our leading newspapers have raised the point that inasmuch as Dr. Lasker was not a member of the German Parliament at the time of his death the resolution of condolence should not have been transmitted to that body. I would quite agree with them provided their statement was correct.

Dr. Lasker, when he died, was a sitting member of the German Parliament, and was about to start for his country to take his seat in the present session of that body. The error of these newspapers must have arisen from the fact that Dr. Lasker was an ex-member of the Prussian Diet, the legislative body of Prussia.

I move that the resolutions be spread upon the Journal of the House.

Mr. KASSON. I have not yielded the floor to the gentleman from Wisconsin for the purpose of making a motion.

I wish to express my regret, Mr. Speaker, that, contrary to what was supposed to be the general sentiment of the House, the incident referred to has been made in any degree a subject of debate on this floor. In my opinion the House best consults its dignity by waiting until some official communication reaches it which gives assurance that for some cause or other improper comments upon its conduct have been made.

We know nothing, sir, except from reports in the newspapers of the country in respect to the action taken abroad in regard to a certain resolution adopted by the House.

I think I only express the common opinion of this body in saying that we have nothing whatever to do with the relations existing between the executive officer of a foreign government and the legislative branch of that government. When we are informed that our rights or our interests or our honor have in any way been affected I have no doubt there will be perfect accord on both sides of this House in respect to the proper action to be taken.

I shall therefore wholly decline to discuss any point suggested in the remarks of the two gentlemen who have spoken this morning. I shall be glad if both gentlemen shall see the propriety of erasing the name of any person beyond our jurisdiction who appears to be an object of censure in their remarks, retaining, as they have the right, what they have said as to the friendly character of the people of the two countries and the relations between them.

For the present I think the House ought to agree we should send the communication presented by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DEUSTER] to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and it will of course be printed in the RECORD. I make that motion, and upon it I ask the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman will withhold for a few moments the demand for the previous question. I desire to say a word.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question before he insists on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Texas must be aware that my desire, which I believe is shared by gentlemen on both sides, is to avoid the premature discussion of this question. For that reason I make the motion. I hope the gentleman from Texas will concur with me in the propriety of that action.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to make a few observations at this moment.

Mr. KASSON. I feel obliged to submit to the wish of the House, and shall test it by insisting on the motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. May I ask the gentleman from Iowa a question?

Mr. KASSON. Yes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman's motion include the suppression of any names from the remarks of the two gentlemen who have addressed the House?

Mr. KASSON. Oh, no; that is entirely within their own discretion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to refer the communication which has been read to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. RICE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICE. I desire to know if there is any business before the House. As I understood, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DEUSTER] made a statement, by unanimous consent, but made no motion. He finished his remarks, and his colleague [Mr. GUENTHER] followed him and made his remarks. No motion up to that time, I understand, was before the House. I desire to know if there is anything before the House now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DEUSTER] arose in his place and stated he rose to a question of privilege. After hearing a brief statement by the gentleman the Chair decided that what he presented was not a matter of privilege and he could only proceed by the unanimous consent of the House. No objection was made. Thereupon the gentleman proceeded to present this communication, but made no motion. After that the gentleman from Iowa moved that the communication be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. KASSON. It will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RICE. My question is, whether that motion can be submitted except by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The communication having been presented, the Chair thinks the gentleman from Iowa can move to refer it to the appropriate committee. The gentleman from Iowa demands the previous question on his motion to refer the communication to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. DEUSTER. I have no objection to that.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. GUENTHER. I desire to correct the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] who said no motion was made.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. GUENTHER. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GUENTHER. Or to a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Massachusetts stated I made no motion. I may not have been in order in making the motion, but I did make the motion that the letter read from the Clerk's desk be spread upon the Journal of the House, and I now ask unanimous consent to have that done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] was occupying the floor in the time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON]. The gentleman from Wisconsin on the right [Mr. DEUSTER] presented a communication, which was read as part of his remarks, as the Chair supposed, and will go into the RECORD as a matter of course. If there be no objection this communication will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Chair hears none.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

DISEASES AMONG DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. CALKINS called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business, being the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals. The pending question is on the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole to strike out the fourth section of the bill; and upon that the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Clerk will report the fourth section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That whenever a State or Territory, in any section of which a contagious or infectious disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, fails to make provisions for its extirpation, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 155, nays 116, not voting 49; as follows:

Mr. BARR with Mr. MULLER.

Mr. WAIT with Mr. TOWNSHEND.

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. WHITING.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. PAYNE; if present, Mr. PAYNE would vote "no" and Mr. YOUNG would vote "ay."

Mr. ROWELL with Mr. RIGGS.

Mr. HOLMES with Mr. WILLIS; if present, Mr. HOLMES would vote "no" and Mr. WILLIS would vote "ay."

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. And upon that I demand the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. Pending the demand for the previous question, I submit the resolution which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill as amended be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture with instructions to report a bill which shall embrace a more thorough system of inspection, to the end that no diseased animal shall be exported; and further, to report a bill to organize a more strict quarantine against the importation of diseased animals, and to make such recommendations as will secure by the States such legislation as will eradicate the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia, or any infectious, contagious, or communicable disease incident to animals, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. KASSON. That would kill the bill.

Mr. CALKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RANDALL. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. CALKINS. In the present state of the public business, will not that motion if adopted effectually kill the bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I deny it; it is not an unfriendly motion.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. The bill is in as good shape now as the committee can get it.

Mr. RANDALL. That will depend upon whether the House so considers it, as shown by the yea-and-nay vote, which I now ask.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 138, nays 145, not voting 37; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BELFORD (before the result of the vote was announced). I do sire to state that though during the first call of the roll I was out of the House, I was here during the second roll-call; but as I occupy a seat in the rear of the Hall I did not hear my name called. I would like to have the privilege of recording my vote in favor of the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, Mr. BELFORD'S vote was recorded.

Mr. MORRILL. I was unavoidably absent during the call of the roll. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to vote.

Objection was made.

Mr. MORRILL. If allowed to vote, I would vote for the passage of the bill.

Mr. GUENTHER. I was in the Hall though not in my seat during the call of the roll. I failed to hear my name called. I would like the privilege of having my vote recorded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have the rule read.

The SPEAKER. The rule is very positive. After the second roll-call a member can not have his vote recorded except by unanimous consent. In this case there is objection.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Can unanimous consent be asked for the purpose of recording a vote after the roll-call is completed?

The SPEAKER. The rule will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Upon every roll-call the names of the members shall be called alphabetically by surname, except when two or more have the same surname, then the whole name shall be called; and after the roll has been once called the Clerk shall call in their alphabetical order the names of those not voting; and thereafter the Speaker shall not entertain a request to record a vote or announce a pair. (Rule XV, clause 1.)

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 155 and the nays 127. So the bill is passed. [Applause.]

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF HON. D. C. HASKELL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the special order for this hour.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Thursday, February 28, at 2 o'clock p. m., be fixed as the time for delivering tributes to the memory of the late DUDLEY C. HASKELL, late a Representative from the State of Kansas.

Mr. RYAN Mr. Speaker, this being the hour fixed by special order by the House to pay its tribute of respect to the memory of the late Hon. DUDLEY C. HASKELL, a Representative-elect to this Congress from the second Congressional district of Kansas, I offer the following resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the ordinary business of the House be laid aside in order that appropriate tribute may be paid to the memory of DUDLEY C. HASKELL, late a Representative from the State of Kansas.

Resolved, That in the untimely death of Mr. HASKELL the House has lost a conspicuous and faithful member, his constituents a zealous and capable servant, and the country a citizen of exemplary life, patriotic devotion, and rare promise.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect for his memory and sorrow for his loss, the House, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, shall adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I enter upon this sad duty with a sorrow made poignant by the memory of years of uninterrupted friendship.

DUDLEY C. HASKELL was my associate and colleague in Congress from 1876 to the date of his death. We entered upon Congressional life at the same time. Our relations were always cordial, and were never interrupted by hasty word or unpleasant incident. We conferred concerning our personal interests and public duties with the fullest confidence and without reserve. His sympathy and aid in the discharge of the trusts assigned me I could always command.

My friend and colleague is no more! After a long and heroic struggle against resistless disease, he died at his rooms in this city about half past 4 o'clock of the Sabbath morning the 16th day of December last.

Mr. HASKELL was born at Springfield, Vt., March 23, 1842, and was, as will be seen, still a young man when cut down. He was the son of Franklin Haskell and Almira Chase. His father's family is traditionally traceable to Saxony. They came to America from Scotland, and were among the first who settled in the historic town of Salem, Mass. Subsequent settlements were made by some of them in Connecticut and Vermont. His mother belonged to an old and numerous New England family of that name, some of whom attained to considerable distinction. His parents moved to Massachusetts when he was but two years old, where they continued to reside until September, 1854, when his father went to Kansas, followed by his mother and himself the ensuing March. In 1857 he went back to Springfield, Vt., where he attended school about a year, and then returned to his home and engaged in trade.

Soon after, however, and at the early age of seventeen years, he was moved by the prevailing excitement resulting from gold discoveries in Colorado to go to "Pike's Peak," the name by which that attractive region was then generally but somewhat vaguely known. Fickle fortune withholding her favor, he again sought his home in the fall of 1861, soon after the great civil war had come to deluge the land with the blood of kindred. He entered the military service a lad of but nineteen years, and his superior qualities did not long await recognition, for he was soon assigned to the important position of superintendent of transportation for his division.

In January, 1863, he retired from the military service, and in the following March entered school at Easthampton, Mass. Remaining there for a time, he was admitted to Yale College, and took a special scientific course.

In November, 1865, he married Miss Harriet M. Kelsey, of Berkshire County, Massachusetts, a lady of culture and refinement, to whose beauty of character, untiring devotion, patient courage, high order of intellect, and splendid mental equipment Mr. HASKELL was largely indebted for his subsequent brilliant success.

Immediately after his marriage he returned with his young bride to his Kansas home, in the city of Lawrence, where he engaged in mercantile pursuits, in which he continued with indifferent success until 1876. He entered political life, however, in 1871, when he was elected to the lower house of the Kansas Legislature. At that time it was not his purpose to remain in public life, but rather to enter the profession of the law, a field of service for which he was exceptionally well fitted by his remarkable perceptive powers, analytic faculties, terseness and cogency of logic, and perspicuity and affluence of diction. Subsequent events diverted him from this purpose and gave his remaining years to the business of legislation. In 1873 he was again elected to the State Legislature, and still again in 1875, when he was chosen speaker of the house. As member and speaker he gave evidence of abilities and developed an aptitude for legislative duties that suggested his candidacy for Congress, and in 1876 he was elected to the lower House of the Forty-fifth Congress, and was successively chosen to the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses.

When Mr. HASKELL entered the Forty-fifth Congress many important interests of his district were greatly in need of legislative relief. To this work he at once applied himself with such diligence, that before he had completed his second term ample legislation for that purpose had been secured. He was vigilant and active respecting all matters of interest to Kansas, and there is little of Federal legislation affecting her development upon which he has not left his impress.

He was fond of his constituents and proud of his State. In conversation he delighted to dwell upon the early struggles and triumphs of the young Commonwealth. He indulged a just pride in having borne a part in all her vicissitudes. When but a lad of thirteen years he participated in the contests and shared in the privations of the period. Fresh from his New England home, imbued with a love of freedom and prompted by the zeal inspired by the passions of the time, he shouldered his rifle and with his command marched forth to battle for human liberty.

Mr. HASKELL was gifted with a splendid physique, being considerably over six feet high and symmetrically proportioned. His bodily strength was great, and he was passionately fond of athletic sports.

In thought, speech, and action he was vigorous and aggressive. It seemed impossible for him to be lukewarm or apathetic in the performance of any task or the discharge of any duty. Though it were but a friendly office in one of the Departments of the Government for some humble constituent, he undertook it with cheerful alacrity. If the recognition of the presiding officer were sought, it was with tone so commanding and vigor of purpose so evident, that the Chair found it easier to respect than to ignore. Whether debating a question of order or discussing a great public measure, he summoned all the resources of body and mind, and directed them against the position of his adversary with an energy that must have put his nerve power to serious test and materially impaired his vital forces.

Mr. HASKELL was a diligent student, especially of history and political economy. With the entire history of his own country and its legislation he made himself as thoroughly familiar as though he had lived through it and borne a part in it.

For the legislative arena he was in all respects splendidly equipped. To every duty assigned him he brought the most thorough preparation. He made himself master of every principle, every detail, and every accessible fact pertaining to the subject. Just in his purposes, with preparation never inadequate, with a sagacity that always chose the strongest position, and a courage that was invincible, he proved himself on this floor to be a "foeman worthy of the steel" of the ablest and the most undaunted. It was only after the fullest investigation and the most careful deliberation that he reached important conclusions, and then he was as unyielding in his convictions as he was zealous in their defense. Though often impetuous, ardent, and nervously energetic in what he undertook, he was yet cool, prudent, wise, and sagacious in counsel. His was

> A combination and a form, indeed,
> Where every god did seem to set his seal,
> To give the world assurance of a man.

There were two great subjects to which my late colleague gave exhaustive study and profound thought—polygamy in the Territories and the system of protection to American industry.

He regarded polygamy not merely as a crime against society, defiling and perverting those family relations and home ties which are the very flower of our civilization, but as an organized and defiant enemy of our Government and its institutions. Thus believing, he determined to attack it with all the legislative powers that it was practicable to invoke for its destruction. When the Forty-seventh Congress met he moved against it promptly, planting himself upon the broad proposition that to send to this body a polygamous representative of that great crime was an offense against the honor and dignity of the House of Representatives. After a memorable struggle he was sustained and the Delegate-elect refused a seat. He subsequently championed the bill for the suppression of polygamy in the Territories, and pursued it with marked parliamentary skill and energy to a successful issue.

But it was the subject of tariff revision which so largely engaged the attention of the House at the closing session of the last Congress that brought into active exercise his rarest talent for debate and his consummate skill in the application of parliamentary law. It was that notable parliamentary struggle that brought him conspicuously before the country as one of the ablest expounders and strongest advocates of that great economic system. To this subject he doubtless devoted profounder study and more thorough investigation than to any other that had ever challenged his attention. He represented an agricultural people, and the great problem presented for his solution was the effect and influence of the system of protection upon the chief industry of his own people. To this end he traversed the domains of history, science, philosophy, and precedent, and it was the light thus gained that made his pathway clear and determined his purpose beyond fear or cavil. Those present who were members of the last Congress need not be reminded with what force of logic, comprehensiveness of information, and patient mastery of details he supported his matured convictions on this floor. Nor can it be doubted that the intense mental strain, long continued, and the excessive labor which characterized the part he bore in that memorable contest sapped his vital forces, destroyed his capacity for natural and healthful repose, and left him an easy prey to insidious and fatal disease.

DUDLEY C. HASKELL'S private life was without a stain. From boyhood his was a career of religious fervor. His faith was implicit and sublime. He knew his God as surely as he knew the tranquil beauty of the stars or the meridian splendor of the sun. No lingering doubt disturbed his belief in the divinity of Jesus Christ and a future state of eternal bliss. To him death was the gateway to an eternity of purity, serenity, and joy. The work of the Church and the Sabbath school was to him a labor of love. So high and pure were the order and quality of his character, that he was an easy master of every temptation.

His home was to him the one spot on earth of supreme felicity, typical of that higher home and more numerous family to which he has been summoned. His great heart was entirely consecrated to his family. His affection for wife and children was as sweet and pure as a mother's kiss. His was the home of peace, confidence, and contentment. No vision of glory could dim the luster of his fireside, no ambition dull the calm delights of his hearthstone. It was the abiding place of all the domestic virtues. Chief and empress of them all reigned Love, around whose throne shone the mellow light of Christian charity—

> The spot where angels find a resting place
> When, bearing blessings, they descend to earth.

Mr. HASKELL was a steadily and even a rapidly growing man. Each succeeding effort surpassed the last. In him were possibilities that pointed to the best and proudest results of statesmanship He relied upon hard work rather than upon genius. His definition of ability was intelligent industry. He regarded genius and talent as infant energies that could only be developed into robust manhood by the severest toil.

His early death must be considered a national calamity. The great principles he so ardently espoused and so powerfully maintained have sustained a grievous loss. The vigorous and stalwart young State he in part represented with so much honor and fidelity bows under the burden of her great bereavement. Just, genial, honorable, and artless, he has gone to his reward.

> His life was gentle: and the elements
> So mixed in him that nature might stand up
> And say to all the world—"This is a man!"

I seem to see now in fancy my departed friend on that far shore, his once soaring spirit in peaceful repose at last, basking in the glad sunlight of an eternal morning. From that infinite height may we not fancy him comprehending in the vast sweep of his perfected vision the places, events, and interests that attracted his thoughts and engaged his energies in life? So shall he look down upon a grateful country, her reverent millions paying the tribute of tears to one who served their interests faithfully, whose devotion to the cause of social regeneration and whose championship of the rights and dignity of American labor challenged their sincere admiration. In the van of them all will he behold the sorrowing hosts of his own State, watering his grave with tears and bedecking it with lily and immortelle. When these flowers fade and their fragrance perishes, surviving affection will rear a sculptured column above his dust, and the enduring marble itself shall crumble and decay ere his name and fame fade from recollection.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, the premature death of so enlightened and courageous a legislator as Hon. DUDLEY C. HASKELL was an event to be solemnly commemorated. It was more than a bereavement to his family and friends. It was a national calamity.

When at the close of the Forty-seventh Congress, on the 4th of March last, I parted from him it was with a feeling of affectionate gratitude for the generous manner in which he had assumed in the Committee on Ways and Means and in the conduct of the business of the committee on the floor of the House duties which belonged to me, but for the energetic performance of which a hideous disease was day by day disqualifying me. I felt that after years of pleasant and, to me, instructive association our pathways now finally diverged; that he, with his giant frame, his active and cultivated intellect, his indomitable energy and simple habits of life, went forth to long years of usefulness, while I should seek the repose and endearments of home with an abiding apprehension that my tenure of life would not endure till Congress should reassemble.

Let no man attempt to foretell the mysterious issues of life and death, for it is true now as it was before the Flood, that of two in a field or two grinding at a mill one shall be taken and the other left. In this case the vigorous youth has gone and the diseased old man, restored to health, lives to mourn the loss of his gifted and young colaborer.

Mr. HASKELL'S life was one of ceaseless activity. Conscious of the power with which he was endowed, he regarded it as a trust held in use for others, and though his form was that of Hercules, his mental energy and indomitable will exhausted it at so early an age as to justify us in asserting that death claimed him prematurely.

Born in Vermont, he received his elementary education in his native town, Springfield, and emigrated with his mother to Lawrence, Kans., when but 13 years old. In less than two years from his settlement in Lawrence he enrolled himself in what was known as Stubb's Militia, and bore his part in the labors and perils of those turbulent days of border life as heroically as did the brawniest man in the corps. Released from military service, he returned to Springfield in 1857, entered the high school, and remained as a pupil for something more than a year, when he returned to Lawrence and found employment in a commercial house. He enjoyed the excitement of extreme frontier life during the summers of 1859 and 1860 in Colorado, then known as Pike's Peak, and in 1861 found an acceptable field of labor in the quartermaster's department of the Union Army, in which he rendered two years of faithful service. Notwithstanding his love of adventure, it never quenched his yearning desire for knowledge, and, having obtained further preparatory education, he entered Yale College and passed about two years in a special scientific course of instruction and of commercial education.

Having married Miss Kelsey, of Berkshire, Mass., in December, 1865, Mr. HASKELL again returned to Lawrence and engaged in business. His was not, however, to be a life of quiet and domestic happiness, for which he was abundantly fitted, as was shown by the affectionate dignity with which he ever treated his wife and the tender affection he lavished upon his two little daughters. He seems to have been predestined to legislative life. His representative career began in 1872 and was cut short by his demise in 1883. Meanwhile he had been elected three times consecutively to the Legislature of Kansas, and had in 1876 been spontaneously chosen speaker of the house of representatives. In the fall of that year he was chosen to represent the second district of the State in the Congress of the United States, to which body he was re-elected in 1878, 1880, and 1882.

When first elected to Congress he was but 34 years of age. His district was large in territory and his unusually numerous constituency increased with a rapidity possible only in the most fertile and accessible of our frontier States. It was a purely agricultural district, but the interests involved in this department of industry in connection with those growing out of Indian affairs, railroad operations, the settlement of immigrants under pre-emption and homestead laws made demands upon him exacting enough to test the strength and patience of the most vigorous and devoted Representative; yet, while neglecting none of these interests, Mr. HASKELL found time to study diligently and with appreciative interest the economic laws which promote the progress of nations in population, wealth, and intelligence.

Looking beyond the district he had been chosen to represent, and the magnificent young Commonwealth of which it was a part, he was ever ready to give careful and conscientious consideration to the most minute interest of the citizens of any State which might be affected by proposed legislation. He had read the writings of the masters of the British school of political economy, and his tenacious memory was charged with the language in which most of the specious fallacies they announce as self-evident truths had been expressed; but his trenchant habits of investigating theories, by whomsoever propounded, had saved him from their intellectual domination, and given to the doctrines of social science and national economy, as distinguished from political economy, a capable and courageous propagandist.

He was fond of illustrating the absurdity of the accepted dogmas of political economy by reference to one of the fundamental propositions of its most generally accepted teachers, Malthus and Ricardo.

The fundamental assumption on which these masters based much of their system, and on the correctness of which they were accepted as the highest British authorities, was that, guided by an unerring instinct of self-interest, men always settle first upon the richest lands, and when these are occupied their successors are forced to spend their labor on inferior and ever-increasingly inferior lands, so that by this "inflexible" law the means of human sustenance would increase in but arithmetical progression while people to require sustenance would increase geometrically. From this assumption, the falsity of which the early history of every country displays, these accepted authorities had reached the conclusion that war, pestilence, and famine are beneficent agencies provided by a kind Providence to prevent mankind from passing through civilization into cannibalism as the result of the overpopulation of the globe.

Mr. HASKELL'S was a devoutly religious nature, and though he may not at first have been able to successfully dispute the premises or overthrow the logic of Malthus and Ricardo, he doubted the premises and shrunk from the impious conclusion that an all-powerful and beneficent God, in ordering His providence, had so adjusted it that the horrors of overpopulation must forever cloud the social atmosphere, and that the sole agents for correcting this false adjustment of means to ends provided by the Almighty was the ghastly trinity of war, pestilence, and famine.

On the fertile prairies and slopes of Kansas young HASKELL found nature's demonstration of the absurdity of this "dismal" assumption and her refutation of the logic by which this impious assault on the goodness of God had been enforced. The proof Kansas furnished the seemingly sterile slopes and hills of Colorado corroborated. Observation taught him that neither individual immigrants nor colonies ever settle first upon the best lands of the country into which they go as pioneers. These lands have ever been, as they now are, the bottom lands, which can not be adapted to the uses of social life till population and capital have accumulated in force and power sufficient for their adequate drainage and the application of other costly prerequisites to healthful occupation; primitive settlement always takes place on uplands, which natural drainage prepares for human occupation. The study of the progress of the early settlement of the British Islands and of the topography of early British traffic and post-roads would have saved Malthus and Ricardo from the amazing blunder of predicating their pretentious works on so glaring a fallacy.

The discussion of the problems of national economy was a passion with Mr. HASKELL; and yet he never carried with him on the stump a protectionist authority. His favorite book for campaign purposes was Bastiat's Sophisms of the Protectionists. His method was, so he told me, to read one or more of Bastiat's most plausible propositions and then to proceed to refute them by appeals to the personal knowledge and experience of his auditors. Representing an agricultural constituency and State, he believed devoutly in the maintenance of a protective tariff as the only effective means of developing all the resources of the country and of cementing its unity by that law which produces the most perfect harmony of interests as the result of the widest possible diversity of pursuits; and his intelligence and the zeal with which he sought to propagate his economic faith had persuaded me that there lay before him a career of national usefulness which personal aptitudes and the course of events open to but few men of a generation.

Mr. HASKELL, with his Herculean frame, his deep voice, and his sometimes sternly Puritan visage, was a genial companion and in all the honorable strifes of public life a generous foe. An incident, which I may without impropriety mention, will serve to show the frankness and generosity of his nature. The time approached for closing general debate on the tariff bill, which the Committee on Ways and Means had reported to the House with a favorable recommendation. This honorable duty belonged to me as chairman of the committee that had reported the bill; but in view of the physical and nervous prostration from which I was suffering I shrunk from its performance and would have gladly confided it to either Mr. HASKELL or Major MCKINLEY of Ohio, between whom and myself there was most perfect accord. But while I rejoiced in the fact that I had these two thoroughly instructed and trustworthy colleagues upon whom to devolve the duty, I could not determine to which the honor belonged, and submitted the question to the parties themselves for settlement. Upon what grounds it was determined I have never heard; but it was agreed that Mr. HASKELL should make the closing speech.

Early on the 27th of January, 1883, Major MCKINLEY submitted his views to the House and commanded a unusual measure of attention. Sound in argument and aptly illustrated by facts drawn from our past and current history and that of foreign manufacturing nations, the speech exhibited his complete mastery of the great subject of economic science. As he took his seat members crowded about him to thank and congratulate him. Early among these was our friend HASKELL; his tall figure towering above those who preceded him, and with his long arm outstretched above them toward the hero of the occasion, he said with much earnestness, "MCKINLEY, I shall make the last speech in favor of the bill, but you have closed the debate and I thank you for your splendid effort."

This generous incident was thoroughly characteristic of the man; but he who would fully appreciate the generous impulse that prompted it should read the speech with which its author did in less than two hours proceed to close the debate. It abounded in facts, each statement of which was uttered as an illustration of well-considered doctrine; and though it contained no allusion to the impious doctrines of Malthus and his disciple Ricardo, it is in itself their specific refutation. One of its leading objects was to show that the agricultural States needed diversification of employments; that the workshop and the factory should be located in the midst of diversified agriculture; that farming communities that depended on distant markets for their productions were compelled to sell the vital elements of their soil and to thus diminish the rewards of their future labor; and that the establishment of manufacturing and commercial centers in the midst of agricultural communities, by furnishing markets for green crops, spring vegetables, lamb, veal, eggs, and other small products of the farm, not only enhanced the value of land, but increased its productive power by producing natural fertilizers, so that instead of increase of population tending to famine, in connection with good husbandry it tended to increase of production and more abundant means of subsistence.

That speech was an illustration of the power and noble aim of DUDLEY C. HASKELL, and should be distributed widely enough to keep his memory green in every homestead of the State he loved so well and in the service of whose people he sacrificed his life by unresting toil that exhausted a young giant's vital forces.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, when death stills forever the heart of its victim calumny and enmity stand silent, partisan and personal animosity are hushed, and friendship and charity unite to weave garlands of sweet flowers and immortelles for the new tomb, to commemorate the virtues and to signalize the immortality of the lamented dead. This House meets to-day to pay a merited tribute of honor and respect for our departed comrade, Hon. DUDLEY C. HASKELL.

I knew Mr. HASKELL not from personal intimacy, but from my relations to his public service in this House and upon the Committee of Ways and Means during the Forty-seventh Congress. He was a native of Vermont, but in early life sought as his residence the new State of Kansas, which came into the Union after unusual disturbances of its peace and order during its Territorial life. Mr. HASKELL was an earnest Republican, and no doubt partook somewhat of the intense feelings which had marked the early history of Kansas; and these gave decided direction to his political opinions. He was a strong partisan, and yet kind and liberal in his personal intercourse with his political opponents.

I found him on committee very diligent, practical, and earnest in all its labors. Decided in his convictions, he had the courage which they inspire in maintaining his opinions. He took a very prominent part in the last Congress in the debates in committee and in the House upon the tariff question, and manifested great zeal and industry in the investigation of the facts, statistics, and principles which, in his view, should guide the policy of the Government upon that very controverted question.

Upon questions involving the rights and interests of his own people, including those of Indians inhabiting the State of Kansas, he was vigilant and untiring. He spoke always with great earnestness and with abilities which were practical, direct, and instructive. He was remarkable for great industry, and acquired with diligence all the information which in his judgment would reflect light upon the subject under discussion.

In all my relations with him we were friends. No word or action on either part was ever designed, I am sure, to wound the feelings or to disturb these cordial sentiments; and with this happy retrospect of our friendship I am glad on this occasion to pay this brief and imperfect tribute to the public and private integrity, to the patriotism and ability of an honored citizen, and to the private virtues of my departed friend. He has left an honorable public record, the character of an honest and upright man, and the memory of private and domestic virtues which will keep his memory green in the hearts of the people of his State, of his personal friends, and, above all, of his bereaved and loving household.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, by the death of DUDLEY C. HASKELL the country lost an eminent statesman and this House a valued member.

It is proper that the ordinary course of legislation should stand still, and that we should pause in our own daily course to honor his memory, imbibe a lesson from his example in life, and take heed from his early death.

Others will speak of his last hours. I will only attempt to bear testimony, in brief words, to his excellent life.

Says a famed writer (Johnson): "It matters not how a man dies, but how he lives."

Mr. HASKELL died young and in the full bloom of a useful public life. Born March 23, 1842, he died December 16, 1883, less than 42 years of age. Though of New England parents and birth, he was at 13 years of age upon the plains of Kansas, and in an essential sense engaged at the beginning of the long and bloody battle for human freedom, which ended only after half a million of men were slain by the surrender of the insurgent armies in 1865. I have heard him speak of standing with his hand in his mother's behind the rude parental habitation in Kansas, when but a youth, to avoid the bullets fired by those who sought to carry slavery into the fair territory west of Missouri.

From patriotic, freedom-loving lips of parents and in the fierce struggle to stay aggressive slavery in its threatening efforts to secure supremacy DUDLEY C. HASKELL early learned heroic lessons, which guided him through life. He was a volunteer soldier in the late war.

He served three terms in the house of representatives of the State of Kansas, the last term as its speaker. He was a distinguished public educator. He served three full terms in this House, including the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, and Forty-seventh Congresses, and he was here, though prostrated on his death-bed, with hopeful anxiety to take the oath of office and enter upon a term in this House to which he had been by his constituents elected. Through his friends he besought the Speaker to find some justifiable precedent or constitutional right to go to his bedside and qualify him as a member of this House by administering to him the oath prescribed by law and the Constitution. He had a colleague select him a seat, which he prayed to be spared to occupy. He, prompted by duty to his constituents and to his country, besought the privilege, through a colleague, to offer a large number of bills he had prepared, so that they might go early to committees. His thoughts in his last hours were of duty here, though his malady was of a kind that caused him much bodily pain.

Death brought peace and tranquillity to a busy, restless soul, and changed duty on earth and to his fellow-man to other and higher duties in realms above.

He was a firm believer in God and a better life beyond the grave, and he lived an honest, pure, Christian life, worthy of example to all.

He was a man of firm convictions and keen perceptions of the right. He was opposed to slavery, to polygamy, and to every evil that degraded the human race. He was no fanatic. He gave a reason for his belief, and generally found the right one. His sanguine temperament gave him the appearance at times of being hasty in reaching and expressing conclusions on grave questions. But he was a student, and made his researches patiently and generally alone; and when his mind was satisfied he zealously tried to impress his views upon others. He gave little, if any, time to idle speculation over important subjects, but preferred by study to exhaust them before he talked much about them.

He was temperate in his habits, and only intemperate in his ceaseless toil. He had little time for social life; not that he was averse to it, but because he regarded it time lost. Perhaps more of social commingling and less of constant application to what he regarded his higher duty would have prolonged his life and his usefulness.

His great, strong body was too seldom relaxed, and, as a consequence, physical exhaustion came, followed by death.

The sum of his work in his six years of Congressional life is great, and in point of material usefulness to his country equals the best of his colleagues or predecessors.

In the beginning of the American Congress a member of this House represented about thirty thousand inhabitants. Mr. HASKELL received, when elected to the Forty-seventh Congress, 30,758 votes, and there were cast in his district at the same election 54,495 votes, representing a population of probably 275,000, enough to have given above nine Representatives in the first Congress. The average population of a district, based on the population of 1880, is 151,912.

It is not in the matter of population alone that we find evidence of multiplied duties for members of this House over those of members of earlier days. It is more marked in the new, multiplied, and diversified interests of the present as compared with those of the earlier and simpler days of the Republic. The duties of a member now exceed the necessary duties of a member in earlier days so much that comparison is hardly possible. His duties then and now can more appropriately be placed in contrast than in comparison.

We look to remote times for the higher types of statesmanship, because we are too apt to revere indiscriminately men and things of the past. I believe modern statesmen are purer, abler, harder-worked if not wiser men than their predecessors.

When Mr. HASKELL was made a member of the Ways and Means Committee of this House in the last Congress he was not specially familiar with the details of the important business to be brought before it, yet when it ended its labors with the Congress he was master of the subjects before that committee. None excelled him. His labors bore fruits which have ripened in the sunshine of material progress and have been garnered by a busy, prosperous nation. He loved and clung to his wife and children. They loved him. Mr. HASKELL fell at his post of life's duty. He so lived as to be ready and prepared to die. He successfully tried to do his duty to his country, his family, and to his God. His body was borne from the scene of his toil and public life here to his Western home, and buried there with honor in the midst of a people who knew, loved, and trusted him. They were proud of him in life; he of them. Dead, they honor and revere his memory. He fought for the rights and liberties of man, and went down in the forefront. His whole career blossomed with patriotism and love for his fellow-men. He lies buried among a restless, dauntless, ambitious people. This is eminently fitting and proper.

> Let the sound of those he wrought for,
> And the feet of those he fought for,
> Echo round his bones for evermore.

And, further, in the words of England's laureate:

> Such was he: his work is done;
> But while the races of mankind endure
> Let his great example stand,
> Colossal, seen of every land,
> And keep the soldier firm, the statesman pure,
> Till in all lands and thro' all human story
> The path of duty be the way to glory.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I can not permit this occasion to pass without adding a word expressive of my high appreciation of the character and qualities of our late associate, and of the deep sorrow I feel in common with many others at his early and premature death.

I knew DUDLEY C. HASKELL well and intimately. We entered Congress at the same time, seven years ago, and early in our service here became friends. This friendship grew warmer, closer, and more confiding until the day of his death. During the last Congress it was my fortune to be a fellow-member of the same committee, and almost daily for months we sat side by side in the committee-room. It was there I came to learn his virtues and appreciate his high qualities of head and heart. He was a valued friend, unselfish and always manly, and a steady ally in committee or on the floor of the House. He was a man of pure thought and lofty purposes, keen perception and clear judgment, whose life was helpful to all who came within the circle of his influence, and whose strong individuality impressed itself upon the affairs in which he took part.

He was a man of great integrity. There were no dark corners in his character to be hid from sight; his life was an open book of rare worth, without blur or defect. His politics, like his religion, was born of genuine conviction. He loved liberty, and hated oppression and proscription in every form. He would become eloquent and his words glow with rare fervor in his recital of the early struggles of his State for liberty and free government. He had convictions, and they pierced and possessed his soul. They were a part of him, and he never lacked the courage to utter them. He was a man of stern will and unremitting industry. He never spared himself or shirked duty, responsibility, or labor. He was an indefatigable worker, often touching the extreme limit of physical possibilities. He was not only a student, but he was a scholar; however, most of his intellectual equipment was self-acquired and earned outside of college walls. He never stopped until he had mastered the subject in hand. He built from the bottom, digging deep, and he always builded well.

He was a strong debater, with a voice which could penetrate every part of this Hall; with great readiness, a commanding presence, and a well-stored mind he stood in the front rank of the ablest and best of his fellow-members.

In the Forty-seventh Congress he took a high place among his associates, and had he been permitted to take his seat in this Congress he would have stood ahead of those to whom we gladly accord the rank of leadership.

Death claimed him at the very threshold of a great career—at the moment when he seemed best prepared for wider usefulness and for the achievement of higher triumphs, when he appeared best fitted to serve his State and country. But he is gone. DUDLEY C. HASKELL is no longer among us, called by a wise Providence from this presence. We bow to this decree, pausing only a little while to-day, not to question the inscrutable mysteries of that Providence or to challenge His ordering, but to pay our last tribute, give our heart offerings to one who in life we loved and honored, and who, though removed from these scenes forever, leaves behind naught but memories most pleasing and reflections most instructive, and the record of a life the study of which can not fail to make us better citizens, wiser and more faithful representatives of the people. His family have lost the devoted husband, the affectionate and generous father, his district and State a strong Representative on this floor, the country at large a wise and patriotic public servant, and all of us a faithful friend and valuable associate.

Mr. RICE. Mr. Speaker, Mr. HASKELL was born in Vermont in 1842. When he was less than a year old his father moved to Massachusetts. The father was a strong, energetic, restless man, of that peculiar New England type who have carried and planted the principles and institutions of the Puritans from Plymouth to Oregon. During the ten years he lived in Massachusetts he was a resident in half as many different towns, making his mark in all as a man of spirit and vigor but finding a settled home in none. At last, in 1853, he came to North Brookfield, a town in my own county, then, as now, famous for the manufacture of boots and shoes. In that beautiful village, under the shadow of the largest boot factory in the world, he rested in his wanderings and fancied he had found permanent shelter and home. Dudley attended the public school during its sessions, and worked in the boot factory in odd hours and vacations. Pegging-machines, except by human flesh and blood, had not then been invented, and the little fellow pegged brogans made of unbleached russet leather, for the Southern market. He was industrious and earned good wages, but is still remembered as sometimes apparently forgetting his work and losing himself in reverie. He was called absent-minded. Was he dreaming of the time when he should stand, the central figure to thousands of eyes, uttering words to be read by millions, influential in shaping the laws of the Republic freest and most imperial of history?

With characteristic enterprise the father invested all his resources in constructing from an abandoned church a four-tenement house. It was nearly finished for its new purpose, when on the night of July 4, 1854, it was burned to the ground. The father was ruined financially by the calamity; to the son it opened the career which was to lead on and up to the high places of the land.

In 1854 Kansas was a wilderness. The tide of emigration had reached the great rivers; all along its path the struggle had been waged, with varying fortune, between the spirit of freedom and of slavery. On the borders of the new Territory the rival forces mustered for desperate conflict—should Kansas be slave or free? It seemed as if on the answer to that question hung the mighty issue whether freedom or slavery should forever rule the Republic. Far away on the Atlantic coast Massachusetts watched the conflict and essayed her best endeavors that Kansas should be free. An emigrant aid association was organized; Eli Thayer of Worcester was its projector, Amos Lawrence of Boston its banker, Charles Robinson of Fitchburg its pioneer. A surveying party was sent out in the spring of 1854 who selected a site for a city and named it Lawrence. In August, 1854, the second party of emigrants left Worcester under the lead of Charles Robinson; they were tall men and strong, they were inspired by that strange, fierce instinct, that love of adventure mingled with devotion to a cause, which has impelled the Saxon race westward from the center of Northern Europe over ocean and continent, planting everywhere the pillars of a civilization higher and stronger than the world had known before.

In this company of emigrants was Mr. Haskell senior. The month before all his worldly wealth had vanished in smoke and ashes. With undaunted heart he turned his back upon his past, his face set towards an unknown and perilous future. I saw him that summer afternoon as he commenced his journey for a new home and a free one. In one hand he carried his blanket, in the other his Sharps rifle.

He did not return; but, in the following March, Dudley and his mother, with another company, joined the earlier settlers, and found their home in Lawrence.

The father survived but three years. An elder brother stepped into the vacant place and was to Dudley both brother and father. He urged and helped him to study, and thereby fitted him for the useful and conspicuous life—all too brief—for which he was destined. At the age of 34 he was the honored Representative in Congress of the great State with nearly a million people which was an unpopulated wilderness when a boy of fifteen he first set foot upon its soil.

First elected to the Forty-fifth Congress, he was prevented by sickness from taking the oath on the first day of the session. Many days later he made his appearance, and we saw for the first time his tall, erect, stalwart figure on this floor.

I can see his face as I saw it then, fixed, earnest, resolved, and as I recall it I fancy that I discern that absent, far-away, dreamy expression his comrades saw on it when he was a boy.

From his entrance here he was a marked man. His commanding figure and his powerful voice enabled him to force his way to the front in the stormy debates in which he so often took a part. Sometimes in the early part of his service we might think that he spoke too often and with too little forethought, but we soon learned that he was sincere and earnest, that he never spoke without an honest purpose, and that his very vehemence was but the effort of his strong but not thoroughly disciplined intellect to force its thoughts into proper and consistent phrase. No man grew more rapidly than he in confidence, esteem, and influence. He soon ceased to be a scout, a skirmisher, a sharpshooter, and became a leader of the center columns. About him were men, veterans in service, who had made party issues, questions of political economy, their study for scores of years; others trained and disciplined by the tough contests of professional life, and others polished and refined by the highest culture of this most cultured age; but among them all none were more conspicuous in the great debates of the last Congress than this young man of Kansas, who, through an unsettled childhood, a destitute orphanage, a hand-to-hand struggle for bread and a place among his fellows, at 40 years seemed to have reached but the beginning of his development.

Six brief, bright years of public service, and, "weary with the march of life," he fell—and perished. No, he lives yet—we may not say in what other sphere—he lives here, in the memory of what he did, teacher, example, guide to the young men of the land.

Without early advantages, he did not despond, but constantly pressed forward in usefulness and distinction. Engrossed in exacting occupation, he never forgot the wife and children who loved him for his unselfish, unremitting, thoughtfulness and care. Poor, wanting many things, sometimes hardly pressed, he was always honest; no bribe ever crossed his hand, no thought of illicit gain ever sullied his pure and upright manhood.

He was ambitious. Let us not deny it. He "bore a banner with the strange device—Excelsior." Let us not blame, but praise him for it. Ambition is one of God's best gifts to men. It forces them out of low surroundings, out of ignorance and sloth, into the higher sunlight on the hills. It has its victims. De Long, dying in the snow, was one; Gordon, going alone to the succor of outlying posts of civilization, may be another; but the world is better for them, it builds temples to their memory, sacred places wherein we worship and give thanks that patience, heroism, and high aspiration are still omnipotent in the soul of man. HASKELL was ambitious to serve well and deserve much. He accomplished his wish, but in doing it he assumed burdens he could not carry long.

Fallen in his prime, we mourn for him as a friend; but we are proud of him as another example of what can be done in this free land, in self-development and advancement, by those who will and work.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, we pause from our legislative duties to-day to pay homage to no ordinary man.

DUDLEY CHASE HASKELL, the departed statesman, whose loss the whole country deeply mourns, possessed qualities of head and heart which commanded respect and admiration, not only at his home and in his State, where he was longer known, but in this arena which so severely tries and tests all men.

Mr. Speaker, I can not claim an intimate acquaintance with Mr. HASKELL, as I saw but little of him in the private walks of life; but born as he was in my native State, Vermont, I had a watchful interest and natural pride in his public career. In the Forty-sixth Congress I only knew him as a ready and fearless debater on the floor of the House. The earnestness with which he espoused every great cause that came before Congress impressed his associates that he was interested and actuated by conscientious motives. A most striking illustration of this is his brilliant and powerful speech in the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, in which he so ably discussed and denounced in such scathing terms that wicked system of polygamy which has so long tarnished and disgraced our national reputation.

In the last Congress, where we were thrown together in the Committee on Ways and Means, I became intimate with him. I saw him wrestle day by day for several weeks with all the power and enthusiasm of his nature with that great economic problem—the tariff. This committee, owing to the short time it had to revise the work of the tariff commission, gave no public hearings, which forced the representatives of the numerous interests to be affected by tariff legislation to seek personal interviews with the members of the committee. The daily attendance of members at the sessions of the committee and House necessitated these interviews at the homes of the members, which tended to lengthen the days and shorten the nights, testing their physical capacity almost beyond endurance. It was this long and incessant labor which laid, it is believed, the foundation of an illness from which Mr. HASKELL never recovered. He was untiring in his labors, and appeals to him to investigate the facts in relation to any interest touched by the bill then under consideration were never thrust aside; but his readiness to undertake and his capacity to understand were a marvel to all who came in contact with him.

As a Representative from an agricultural State he occupied a somewhat advanced position on the question to which he devoted the last days of his Congressional life. But having spent his early life in New England, where he acquired his education, and where he had seen so fully illustrated the benefits and advantages of the protective tariff system, he espoused that cause, and ever after supported it with all his power, believing that it was not only for the best interest of his own State, but for the whole country.

The bill which he helped to formulate in committee and so ably defended and advocated on the floor of the House became a law, and Congress adjourned. But that did not bring to Mr. HASKELL needed rest. Having a somewhat doubting constituency, he devoted a large part of his vacation to carrying on, in public meetings and in print, the tariff discussion. Thus deprived of the opportunity to regain his wasted energies, when he came to Washington in November to resume his duties he was broken in health. Though he gradually failed after his arrival, neither his physician nor his immediate friends anticipated so sudden an end. He passed silently and peacefully away in the early dawn of Sunday, the 16th of December. The public had had no warning and were both shocked and surprised at his death.

This breaking up of strong men is a sufficient answer to the popular delusion that a Congressman's life is one of pleasure and idleness. If one yields to the demands of legislative duties and to the various appeals of his constituents, it will most thoroughly test the ability and physical endurance of the strongest.

Mr. HASKELL'S life, though short in years, was large in accomplishment. He had served his country in the Army, his State with distinction as legislator, as speaker of the house, and in Congress for six years. To our limited view it would appear that at this early age, 41 years, he was cut down at the threshold of his greatest usefulness.

In the presence of a higher wisdom and power we wonder, we regret, and reverently submit. If he was to be removed from us, I was glad of the privilege to be one to bear his remains to their last resting-place, and accompany that bereaved and stricken family to their small but beautiful cottage on that eminence overlooking the city of the living so long his home and the city of the dead where he was laid.

There was something especially pleasant and attractive about the homestead he had provided for his family, and it seemed now fitting that it was situated next adjoining that of his older brother, his only surviving relative, between whom and himself there had always existed the most intimate and devoted attachment. The widow and the fatherless children may here live under the protecting shadow of their remaining staff, a brother's protecting care.

The love for our deceased fellow-member and the esteem in which he was held in the community in which he lived were shown by the general suspension of business and the draped private and public buildings on the day of his burial.

Mr. HASKELL'S true Christian character was not only appreciated and understood by his neighbors and the church to which he belonged, but was known and felt by all who came within his influence.

Though our friend has passed away, his pure and upright private and public life must leave an influence for good, and his rapid advancement and brilliant career may be an inspiration to the young men of his State and the country.

In Mr. HASKELL'S death this Congress has lost an able member, the country a broad and progressive statesman, Kansas one of her largest-minded and noblest citizens, the widow a true and fond husband, the children a devoted and loving father.

Mr. Speaker, since we were selected from the people for this Congress seven of our number have been called to that undiscovered country whence no traveler returns. Certainly we are not without admonition or warning of the uncertainty of human life, and that the grim messenger Death is no respecter of persons nor waits any allotted length of life.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, DUDLEY C. HASKELL was my neighbor. His late constituents are neighbors of my constituents. Just across the mightiest and longest river on this continent he lived from boyhood to middle age under my observation.

I can not hope on this occasion to express satisfactorily the height or depth of my appreciation of his pure and exalted character, but silence would be a disappointment to the good people I have the honor to represent and an injustice to my State. A wide divergence in political sentiment creates no prejudice against the possessor of high personal integrity and profound moral worth.

Every intellect perhaps is dominated by some ideal man who exists and can only exist in the imagination. Outward circumstances and surroundings reduce the ideal at last to the practical, and myriad Utopias are forever abandoned and uncolonized. Mr. HASKELL had ideals and ideals, but he was never a dreamer. He sought not a limit in the limitless, a period in eternity, an eternity in human achievement. He believed in creation, but it was in the creation of labor, genius, and activity. With him speech was for light and enlightenment; and he held it vain and meaningless unless accompanied by constant, earnest work for the benefit and elevation of mankind. When Omnipotence determined upon the wonderful creations in, above, and around us, everything required time and labor save light. This He spake into existence by the divine command, "Let there be light."

Mr. HASKELL was at once a believer and a worker. He believed in God and in labor also; in everything that was true and beautiful, and in every good work. He believed in his State and loved her. He believed in his people, and confided in and trusted them without reserve. He believed in his home, and made it, for himself and all its loved inmates, the holiest, happiest place on earth, loved and prized away above and beyond all the glamour and fascination with which the world allures. He believed in and loved the sunset, for he had seen it in Kansas, as it is seen nowhere else on the earth, reflected back through the golden bowels of the Rocky Range.

He was essentially the growth and product of Kansas. Born in a State which has been said to be the best in the Union—to emigrate from—he carried with him to his new home on the banks of the Kaw all the sturdy elements of the New England character, whose groundwork is faith, patience, and perseverance. When scarcely 10 years old he heard the whispered words of preparation for the historic struggles that drove African slavery from Kansas and added Ad astra per aspera to the Federal constellation. He had seen the assault, the charge, and the torch in his beautiful city of Lawrence; and further on had heard in the streets the murderous shouts of Quantrell and his demoniac legion, rioting in the innocent blood of a hundred victims. Had he not been a Christian, scenes like these might have made him a revengeful monster; but when the excitement was over, kneeling reverently in the midst of the dead and dying, if his lips did not utter, his heart responded to God, even in that terrible hour of death and ruin, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do."

He was the growth and product of Kansas; he was more. He was thoroughly Western and American besides. Anything that man had ever done he believed that man could still do. Self-reliant almost to rashness, he never hesitated in the line of duty to reach out for the possible. His investigation of a subject ended only in its mastery. To obscure or confuse it was alike impossible and unnecessary. He was ambitious, and had a right to be. In public life he found a restless yet fascinating pleasure. Success attended him. To the honors of collegiate labor were soon added those of his State and country. Worthily won, they were honorably worn. Achieved by honest merit, they were enlarged and burnished by honest toil and patriotic sacrifices. The trusts reposed in him were sacredly executed. His pledged word was inviolate. His political honor, equally with his personal honor, he kept sacred and spotless. True, brave, and steadfast, his acquaintances became his friends, and the latter were multiplied. His constituents followed him with pride. He was fit to lead. His arguments in this forum were repeated to them without evasion or apology. Frank and honest with his people, he could but be frank and honest with his colleagues on this floor. Seeking to represent faithfully his district and State, he yet had less of the laudable selfishness of local or geographical interests than any of his compeers, and was never unmindful of the great duties he owed to the whole country. He studied and toiled and struggled. Thorough in investigation, accurate in detail, logical in argument, and often eloquent in application and conclusion, he grew strong in debate, and advanced toward the leadership of his party. He was becoming a giant.

Elected a member of this Congress, his responsibilities were enlarged by the general recognition of his intellectual power. He seemed to realize the fact, and prepared himself to meet it. No command of his physicians, no appeal of his anxious friends, could swerve him from what he believed to be the path of duty. He believed the mind should dominate the body, whatever the stress or strain. He had thought much upon legislation, and saw, or thought he saw, the work of his hands in former Congresses about to be reviewed by his political adversaries. The sharp, keen conflict of mind with mind and system with system was already before his eyes. He saw the coming all-night vigils and the glare and heat of the fierce onset—the thrust, the parry, and the parliamentary blow. The tumult of action and cheers of victory resounded in his ears as unconsciously his vital force was departing, pitifully ominous of the end. At his post of duty, overtaxed and overburdened by the peculiar exactions of Congressional life in this House, the lamented HASKELL, like many another, died a martyr to his moral convictions of official obligation.

His life, in all of its relations, was singularly pure, winning, and lovable. As a neighbor, not a drop of levitical blood was ever lodged in his veins. As a Christian, he was the same on the street as at the altar; on the last six days of the week as on the first. He reverenced his honored parents and ever rendered them a cheerful obedience. His tenderness and unselfish love for his true and faithful wife grew into conjugal idolatry; and his absolute devotion to his gifted brother marked every word and act of his life. "Sir," said an old friend of the family on the day of the funeral, "The father must have oft repeated to his sons the fable of the old man and the bundle of sticks, for never have I known brothers so loving and devoted to each other as John and Dudley Haskell." What a divine panegyric upon both!

Sir, there was no drought of tears in Kansas when your committee tenderly deposited the remains of DUDLEY C. HASKELL in the warm and generous bosom of his beloved Commonwealth. Every home wore the emblems of a tearful bereavement; from every eye fell pearly drops of sympathy, and in every heart was a throb of love for the living and the dead. Thus the grave closed over him beneath "an arch of steel."

The twin homes, side by side, on the limits of the beautiful and historic city of Missouri's neighboring sister, are sorely stricken. Not more the head of one than the light of the other, and the love of both, he is already seated in a higher congress than this, over which Jesus our Saviour in love and mercy unerringly presides.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, to our roll-call DUDLEY C. HASKELL no longer answers. He will meet us in council no more. His very silence admonishes us that our days are crowded with sorrows, that joy palls, hope misleads, and that Life is but a walking shadow.

It teaches us the lesson of tolerance and humility, rebukes our pride, points us from a faded past, and bids us hope the glowing radiance of a future life.

My acquaintance with HASKELL began with the Forty-fifth Congress. We entered that Congress together, and from that time until his death, a period of seven eventful years, I was an almost daily witness of the ability and courage which he brought to the discharge of his official duties. When he took his seat in this body he was a young man of but thirty-five, in vigorous health, with muscle hardened by the athletic games and sports of his college days, the hardships of a camp life, and the activities of an exacting business. Among all his associates of the House none seemed to have a firmer hold or a longer lease on life. He appeared to be one whom fate had reserved for a bright and useful manhood.

But he was called to rest as he was being fully equipped for labor. His life ended before its work had fairly begun; but short as was his career, it had demonstrated a capacity for usefulness and gave promise of an illustrious future. When Death called him he was not but was in the vigor of a just ripening manhood. It came when the heart beat high, when ambition was on the wing, when coming years were glowing with brightness.

An old man broken with the storms of State,

Ah! what is human life?
How, like the dial's tardy moving shade,
Day after day slides from us unperceived!
The cunning fugitive is swift by stealth;
Too subtle is the movement to be seen;
Yet soon the hour is up—and we are gone.

Public men have sometimes lived too long, lived until the weaknesses of age entrapped them into a mistake that obscured the record of their earlier achievements; but he of whom we speak died all too soon. His resources had never been fully brought out. He had not been permitted to gather what he had sown, nor had he wrought a full day of labor. He had not attained the fullness of his intellectual growth. Before the opportunity came for bringing out his highest capabilities he was gone, and the world now can only measure him by the work he has left behind him. In the humble tribute I pay his memory to-day I will refer briefly to some of his traits of character as they impressed me during my acquaintance with him in this body, but the most I know of him I learned from the friends of his youth and of his manhood, whose eyes moistened and whose lips quivered as they gave me the story of his life.

Before coming here HASKELL had served with distinction in the General Assembly of his State, and was well trained in the methods of legislative proceedings. He was from the beginning of his Congressional career recognized as among the foremost of his party. As an evidence of the estimate put on his ability by those with whom he served, he was assigned places upon the most important committees of the House. He was equal always to the duties he assumed.

In debate HASKELL talked well. He seldom wandered from his subject, and never fell below the level of the occasion. He was of a robust and well-disciplined mind, and capable of striking vigorous blows for what he believed to be right. In the declaration of his opinions he was bold and frank, and he maintained his views with great zeal. Of an active and aggressive temperament, he sometimes asserted his convictions with an earnestness that seemed dictatorial, but he was ever unconscious of a purpose to offend. Sanguine as he was, he kept his temper under good control, and was seldom, even in the fiercest debate, betrayed into an offensive or intemperate expression. He asserted himself with much positiveness, and was unwilling to seek success through concession or surrender. To him doubts were traitors, and he never allowed them to enter the domain of his beliefs. He was quick in thought and prompt in action. His was

> The keen spirit
> That seizes the prompt occasion—makes the thought
> Start into instant action, and at once
> Plans and performs, resolves and executes.

He was a worker. His was a genius that not only furnished its "own fuel, but lighted its own fire." He never allowed his energies to stagnate.

Those of us who served with him in the Forty-seventh Congress will not soon forget how, through the weary days of the tariff and revenue discussion, he came every morning to the contest with his armory full of weapons both offensive and defensive. His nights were devoted to study, his days to work. When the House adjourned he became a learner; when it met, he was a teacher. To me it seemed that he had mastered the minutest detail of the complex measure under consideration. The fullness of his information, the exactness of his knowledge of every branch of the subject, was a surprise to all who did not know his inflexible purpose and untiring energy.

It is more than probable that these labors so severely taxed his physical resources as to hasten his death; but as man's life-work is all he has to front eternity with, it is no cause for sorrow that the death-wound is received on the field of duty. To know a man's real character, to pass correct judgment on his inner life—his life of motive, of affection, of devotion to duty—we must learn in what esteem he is held by those who have in prosperity and adversity seen his daily walk and conversation. Both adversity and prosperity try the forces of man's spiritual nature. HASKELL had seen both; had been depressed by the one and encouraged and comforted by the other. On the one hand business misfortunes had overtaken him, while on the other political preferment—through the expression of a people's confidence—had crowned him with honor.

At every step he had been confronted by a duty requiring for its performance a courageous manhood, and his neighbors who had witnessed these struggles bore cheerful testimony to their manfulness. His days were not all calm and bright; clouds gathered over them and shrouded them in shadow and darkness; but standing within these shadows he took the measure and method of the world's selfishness, felt the full force of the disaster that reduced him and his loved ones to the verge of poverty, but through it all his integrity and uprightness of character were not for a moment under a cloud. He never made money a god; never veteranized in the war for gold or became soul-scarred in the scramble for wealth. It became my sad duty, under the direction of this House, to accompany those who bore his remains to the city of his home, to the people among whom he had long lived and labored, and by whom he had been four times chosen a Representative here. The grief of his people was unmistakable.

A largely-attended public meeting of the citizens of Lawrence and surrounding country had met and given suitable expression of their sorrow for the loss of their honored fellow-citizen. The city was draped in mourning, and, as was said of Mirabeau, the people crowded "about the house of their tribune as if to catch inspiration from his coffin." In his death some had lost a counselor, some a leader, all a friend. The funeral services were held in the church in which he had been for years a worshiper, and here those who had wrought with him in the church and the Sabbath-school spoke feelingly and eloquently of the purity of his life and his faithfulness to every Christian duty.

HASKELL was an active worker in the church and a firm believer in the gospel of Jesus of Nazareth. His pastor and his colaborers spoke of his life as a lovely example of Christian purity and one that was in the highest and best sense loyal to its professed faith. His faith in the Christian system was deep and abiding; it was the anchor to his hope of the life eternal. To him a confession of unbelief was a wail of pain and despair. He had an undoubting faith in man's immortality. To the inquiry of the patriarch, "If a man die, shall he live again?" he would have answered:

> Shall I be left forgotten in the dust,
> When Fate, relenting, lets the flower revive?
> Shall Nature's voice, to man alone unjust,
> Bid him, though doom'd to perish, hope to live?
> Is it for this fair Virtue oft must strive
> With disappointment, penury, and pain?
> No! Heaven's immortal spring shall yet arrive,
> And man's majestic beauty bloom again
> Bright through th' eternal year triumphant reign.

But his mute lips can send us no message. He has passed through the gates and is solving the great mystery. One who went before him said:

> It can not be that earth is man's only abiding-place.
> It can not be that life is a bubble cast up by the ocean of eternity to float a moment upon its waves and sink into nothingness.
> Else why these high and glorious aspirations which leap like angels from the temple of our hearts, forever wandering unsatisfied? Why is it that the rainbow and clouds come over with a beauty that is not of earth and then pass off to leave us to muse on their loveliness? Why is it that the stars hold their festival around the midnight throne or, set above the grasp of our limited faculties, forever mocking us with their unapproachable glory?
> And, finally, why is it that the bright forms of human beauty are presented to our view and taken from us, leaving the thousand streams of our affections to flow back in Alpine torrents upon our hearts?
> We were born for a higher destiny than earth.
> There is a realm where the rainbow never fades, where the stars spread out before us like the islands that slumber on the ocean, and where the beautiful things that pass before us like shadows will stay forever in our presence.

In this beautiful faith HASKELL lived and died.

Some in this day, I know, regard the term "Christian statesman" as one of reproach; but I am glad to know that in political life there are, oftener than men think, grand characters who, through the blinding glare of wealth and the glamour of temptation, can see God and follow Him, and who, above the angry altercations of scheming and ambitious partisans, above the tumult of the mob that would crucify truth and deify falsehood, can hear God calling to duty, and courageously obey Him.

As I conversed with his neighbors I found the loveliness of HASKELL'S domestic life the theme of every tongue. To make his family circle bright and joyous was his uppermost desire. To him affection was not simply a name and love a mere passion of the hour, but he ever wore the image of his wife and children, like beautiful flowers, next his heart. He filled his cottage home with smiles and melody, and even in the fierce tumult of his political struggles that quiet little home among the forest trees was the goal of his earthly joys and hopes. It was the Mecca to which his heart made constant pilgrimage. That home, once so light and joyous, is darkened now. The angel of death has shadowed it with his wing and turned it into a house of mourning. And now, Mr. Speaker, as we pay tribute to the memory of the dead we may pause and send a message to the widowed wife and orphaned children who are stricken by an incurable grief. The place that was hallowed by a father's and husband's presence is silent and sad, and that broken and bereaved family, in agonizing tears, stand by a fresh-made grave.

But the weary body, broken by disease, lies where no storm can disturb it. The wrecked bark rides at anchor without a disturbing wave. A throng of people—friends, neighbors, and strangers—followed the hearse of their honored dead to the beautiful cemetery close by the city. I was one of that sad cortége. It was a drear December day when, with bowed heads and sad hearts, we lowered his body to its final abode. His grave was made on a gentle knoll in sight of his cottage and overlooking the steepled city. On it the morning sun will rise and evening twilight fade. There the hand of affection will plant the rose and the myrtle. As the years go by the stars will shine upon it and the gloom of the nights that are starless robe it in blackness. The winter winds will shriek above it, and in the spring-time the melody of the bird-song and the perfume of the flowers will environ it. There in the solemn calm of the grave we left him to await the call of the angels.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, among the sweet legends of the past we learn of two islands located in an unknown sea. The one was called the island of the living, and the other that of the dead. Into the former death never could enter. Its city was resplendent with beauty, and in its gardens and parks no flower lost its flush, no violet its hue, and no lily was ever numbed by the hard hand of frost. But disease was allowed to visit its inhabitants. They were blest with the attributes of immortality, yet cursed with the infirmities of humanity. There was immense wealth in this island and all the festivities and festoons that it could afford. There were drum-beats of glory, and the whirls of the dance, and the soft lute-tones of gayety. But the inhabitants of this island wearied of its joys and activities and sought repose beneath the shadows of the island of death. Sleep had taught them that there might be a surcease from sorrow and that the weary limbs and tired souls might somewhere find repose. They constructed their barks, and entering on their uncertain voyage struck for the shores of the other isle and reaching them were at rest.

Does not this legend typify the relations of those who dwell in the annals of time to those who rest in the realms of eternity? The weariness of life inspires the enjoyment of death, and Hamlet expressed but an instinctive fear when he declared in his soliloquy that we must not fly from the burdens of to-day to the uncertainties that might occur to-morrow. "That which is universal can not be an evil."

The dread of death is but an animal instinct. The falling of the leaf is death; the withering of the flower is death; the changing of the foliage in the forest is death.

The wrinkles on our faces, the increasing gray in our hair, are but the indications of the coming of the great Master who gives us repose. His hand, after all, is soft as the dews of the morning. Even the condemned in his prison eats a hearty meal and sleeps quietly the night that precedes his execution. It is not death that is terrible, but it is the separation from friends, the inability to converse with those that are here and those that have departed. Dying is but a disappearing mist from the crest of the mountain, to be followed by the sunshine of a better life. Oh, what a mystery is this art of living! Is it not greater than the mystery of dying? Does one bring more hearty anxieties and solicitudes than the other?

The field of infinite and immeasurable space into which we drift is but the domain of naked conjecture. But here we have the substance where the cactus and poisonous weeds grow and flourish. How many ships with full sails go out into the bosom of the ocean only to return battered and worn! How many hearts commence life joyful and gladsome, to afterwards beat irregular ticks, like a clock out of time! How many things there might have been for which the hungry heart sighed and failed to acquire!

There are many faces in early life gladdened with the joyance of hope and courage, and yet we have seen their smiles fade into gloom and sink below the horizon. Does this life, after all, furnish us with anything but hope inspired and hope disappointed? When we contemplate the problem which each of us must solve, can not we realize that our departed brother is folded in the realm of eternal kindness and has escaped the perplexities with which we are annoyed, and that he is looking upon this world without the red rust of tears that we notice in each other's eyes. We vainly struggle to reach and measure the deep things hidden from our mortal sense. We seek to count the stars, but the most of them are out of our telescopic view, and our dull and stupid souls do not know the deep things that are hidden from us. There is but one sure platform on which we can stand, and that is this: "That God has chosen for the best."

The aching heart and the sorrowful soul look forward to a sweet "By-and-bye," where a pure ideal of what they might have been may be realized and the faults that debased us here may be purged and corrected there; where the drooping flower of this life may be the erect and stalwart of the ages to come; where the crooked ways of this world may be made the straight ones in the next; where the sorrows that shroud the weary soul here may be illuminated by the Eternal Sun that will make them resplendent forever, and that every eye gazing upon them will perceive that the light of God's countenance shines through each soul and will ultimately make it beautiful and serene. This is no vain hope, because it is the harbinger and sunset of the millennium whose arch and span are made up of the promise of beauty and rest.

DUDLEY C. HASKELL was great and noble-hearted; his thoughts and his deeds blended together like the notes that spring from the various strings of a harp. He was courageous and manly in debate and wise and judicious in council. He was affable in his manners, loving, trustful, and honest in all his associations. In his experience he had learned and felt the sentiments expressed by the German poet:

Who never knew misfortune, lived but half;
Who never wept, ne'er heartily did laugh;
Who never failed, could scarce have striven and wrought;
Who never doubted, hardly could have thought.

Through the gradations of labor and poverty he reached this House. He was a conspicuous member on its chief committee, and devoted the energies of his mind and the honesty of his heart to revise those great laws which affect the industrial interests of the Republic. His lips were too white to utter a lie, and his hands too pure to accept a bribe. Why a man thus constituted should in the heyday of his youth have been garnered by the harvester Death passes my comprehension. I feel, and I contemplate the event, like Schiller felt when he wrote his poem entitled "The Battle," and wherein he exclaimed:

Brothers, God grant when this life is o'er,
In the life to come that we meet once more.

Oh, how mournful are the groans that echo from the chambers of death! Of all the sad notes which human ears have heard are the death-notes that accompany the departure of our friends.

He was plucked from us in the very spring-time of his days, with the pulses of thought strong, vigorous, and clear. Is Nature in combination with human souls to enable them to reach the height of perfection in the blush and bloom of their youth and vigor? How enchantingly the rainbow of future promise must have appeared to him, and with what endearment he must have embraced the prophecies of the future. It is inexpressibly sad to witness the scissors of death severing the threads that bind the human soul to this earth, where so much joy and bliss are found. What hopes are crushed; what anticipations are frosted? But is it not a compensation that in the grave our rest is undisturbed? No sorrow, no slander, no venom, and no temptation can touch us then. The ocean that separates this world from the next no human eye can penetrate. The shadow of the future is on the shore of the present, and what lies in that shadow no soul can tell. Oh, how sweet it would be if on this ocean that divides time from eternity, and on which souls are the ships of passage, we could freight these spiritual vessels with messages of love to that "bourn from which no traveler returns!" We would send letters fragrant with the supremest affections of the human soul. We would send bouquets of flowers as beautiful as those that first appeared in the garden of Paradise. But we simply grasp the air, and find our hands empty. We look at the sea, and find it is shoreless. We speak to the departing messenger, and find that to his hands we can consign no commission. My dear departed friend, let me express in the language of one of the world's greatest men and sweetest poets my own sentiments:

Fare thee well, oh, thou to memory dear,
By our blessings lulled to slumbers sweet;
Sleep on calmly in thy prison drear,
Sleep on calmly till again we meet.

Till the loud almighty trumpet sounds,
Echoing through these corpse-encumbered hills;
Till God's storm-wind, bursting through the bounds
Placed by Death, with life those corpses fills.

Till, impregnate with Jehovah's blast,
Graves bring forth and at His menace dread,
In the smoke of planets melting fast,
Once again the tombs give up their dead.

What a wonderful sight we shall some time see when the great of the earth are all gathered there; when the laurels of victory and the cypress of defeat are intertwined without the slightest regret. In the sweeter time to come, when the blossoms all bloom and the infirmities of this life be forgotten, we will realize that the soul is the jewel of all things, and that the circumstances which encompass us here simply tend to brighten and burnish it; that the office of the shadow is to intensify the sunlight. And if there is ultimately to be a perfectibility of the human soul, we will be across the river what we might have been here.

Oh, what is death but a rebirth into that larger life where we go on forever! Who can measure the compass of our existence? We come here without our consent, and depart without being consulted.

Is it possible that our rest is to come in the bosom of the planets that illumine the sky? Are we to realize ultimately that the sun which warms the earth with its heat and makes the grass grow in its vigor and greenness is but a type of the Heavenly Father who counts the number of our hairs and notes the dropping of a sparrow? These, indeed, are puzzling questions, and no man can solve either the riddle of life or death. The pagan religion to the dying had no terrors. The intelligent thought of to-day in contemplating death brings no dismay to thoughtful souls. Once we were unknown and unincarnated, and all of us came into this world indicating our appearance with a cry. Our mothers, who hold the doorway of life, love us when we come and weep when we go out.

Does not the mystery of life increase with every thought touching its conditions? How anxiously we stand on the shore of this ocean, and lift our eyes to the heavens above us, and clasp our hands and ask, "When will the departed return?" Yet it is all in vain and hopeless. Over the ripples of this boundless sea there is no rustle of air that brings us a response:

We long for the touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still.

Can it be possible that the strong attractions of this life by way of personal friendships are but the reproduction of loves and affections that existed in the ages before when our spiritual incasements were entirely different? On this subject I can think of nothing sweeter or better than the poem of Colonel Joyce, entitled "Unknown," which I repeat:

I gazed on the babe at its mother's breast,
And asked for the secret of life and rest;
It turned with a smile that was sad and lone,
And murmured in dreaming, "Unknown, unknown."

I challenged the youth so bold and so brave
To tell me the tale of the lonely grave,
But he sung of pleasure in musical tone,
And his echoing voice replied, "Unknown, unknown."

Then I questioned the gray-haired man of years,
Whose face was furrowed with thought and tears,
And he paused in his race to simply groan
The soul-chilling words, "Unknown, unknown."

I asked the lover, the poet, and sage
In every clime and every age,
To tell me the truth, and candidly own
If, after death, 'tis all unknown, unknown?

I soared like the lark to the boundless sky,
Sighed in my soul for the how and the why;
The angels were singing and just had flown,
I heard but the echo, "Unknown, unknown."

We come like the dew-drops, and go like the mist,
As frail as a leaf by autumn's winds kissed;
Fading away like the roses of June,
Wishing and waiting to meet the Unknown.

Nature, oh! Nature, the god I adore,
There's light in thy realm, I ask for no more;
From the seed to the fruit all things are grown,
Yet, while we know this, the cause is unknown.

When matter and mind are perished and lost,
And all that we see into chaos is tossed;
From nothing to nothing we pass out alone,
Like a flash or an echo—"Unknown, unknown"

We grope in the dark and inquire why we have been brought here, and we vainly study what is to be the end of our being and whether we shall attain a definite object or miss it altogether. Tennyson in the following lines has expressed the despair and the hope of every human soul:

Behold, we know not anything;
I can but trust that good shall fall
At last—far off—at last, to all,
And every winter change to spring.

So runs my dream; but what am I?
An infant crying in the night;
An infant crying for the light;
And with no language but a cry.

Oh, how the great of this earth from the times of Zoroaster and Christ to those of Swedenborg and Wesley have struggled to solve the problem, "What am I, and why am I?" No satisfactory solution has been found. Descartes summed up his philosophy by declaring, "I think, therefore I am." Seneca, staggering in the dark, shouted out, "If only one might have a guide to truth." "We must wait," Plato declared, "for one, be it a god or god-inspired man, to teach us our religious duty." And Cæsar declared in the Roman Senate that there was no god and that the future was more than a blank. The world, after all, must rest on its growing faith, and as man gets better and sweeter and more virtuous in his life his god assumes these attributes, just as the Grecian gods took on the character imparted to them by the Athenians. It would seem to me that in the mazes of this life we might receive at least an occasional revelation that would quiet our anxieties and give our souls actual assurances of a positive immortality

But if there be a personal God we can not judge of the wisdom of his designs until we know the end he seeks to accomplish. I remember once to have stood by the side of a loom where they were weaving Brussels carpet. The design of the weaver was unknown, and the figure but half completed. I said there was too much black and too little white, too much pink and too little yellow. Turning to me, a lady remarked, "without knowing the design your criticism is unjust." This weaver but typifies the Almighty Weaver, who has all our human souls like so many threads on His infinite loom, and when the carpet that he is making is spread on the floor of eternity and illuminated by the light of His countenance, it will be found that there is not one thread of white too much nor of black too little.

Mr. HANBACK. Mr. Speaker, more than sixteen years ago two towns in my State of Kansas were arrayed against each other upon a question of small import to the world, but at that time of much importance to those two young municipalities of that young Commonwealth. A thousand people gathered there upon the open plain to witness eighteen young and stalwart men engaged in a contest at base-ball, and of that number, bright and brave, stood DUDLEY C. HASKELL, the chief of his nine.

And there for the first time I met him in that friendly conflict. From thence on we grew in acquaintance which ripened into friendship such as few men enjoy in this world. I knew him in the pride of his manhood, when the shadows were falling far behind his back and when his eye was bright with hope as he looked into the future. I knew him when he was struggling in adversity while engaged in a lawful and honorable calling in merchandise in his city, when bankruptcy, long deferred, stared him in the face, and at last fell upon him and blighted his business prospects and darkened his home. But in that hour the face of that man was sublime, serene, and perfect, because his hands were as white as the snow which fell upon his grave that drear December day when the citizens standing around gave their blessing and their tears to him and to his.

He was not successful in a business point of view. His life was created for another purpose, and the time was coming when he was lifted out of the slough of despond into which he had been thrown.

He was sent to the Legislature of his State, and then for the first time he stood a master among men. With one accord and with unanimous voice he was selected to preside over the deliberations of that body; and it is to his high credit, and was always a matter of pride with him, that no decision he had made during his term of office as speaker was reversed by the house. He went down from his high place receiving the plaudits of all men, whether they differed from him or not on the political questions of the day.

In the summer of 1876, after a close contest in the Congressional convention of his district, he was chosen as the nominee of the Republican party. Against him in the contest was pitted a man who was known with distinguished credit to himself in that State; a man coming fresh from the Halls of Congress, who had acquitted himself honorably and creditably in that capacity, and who bore upon his party ensign not the name of Republican, but that of Democrat. He was a man well known and respected, who bore a proud name among the people whom he had served; a man whose counsels were respected and wise, and who had presided as a judge in a district composed of a large portion of that Congressional district for many years. This was the man with whom the young candidate for the suffrages of the people was to lock hands in a contest that would be to the death.

I remember well the day when the ensign of victory floated over the head of DUDLEY HASKELL, and his future was assured. Five thousand people were assembled at Olathe, in his district. His opponent spoke and others spoke; general debate was in progress, and yet HASKELL was not there. And I remember the sneer that went forth as they said he did not dare to come. But he was coming; he was coming by a slow freight train, for come he would, and there was no other train available. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon a team driven madly on came up, and HASKELL, covered with dust and smoke, leaped upon the platform ready to grapple with his antagonist. The victory for a while seemed doubtful, it wavered and pointed the other way, but in a moment all was changed. Throwing his coat aside, HASKELL stood forth in the presence of the throng in all his magnificent manhood to present his powerful views of the great questions of the day to the expectant crowd. I tell you that when that contest was over, when that debate was done, the future of that man was assured, the future of the contest in that district was assured, and all men yielded to that opinion.

Called by the voice of the people of that district to come here as their Representative in this House, he came at their behest, although deathly sick, grasping for life, almost then gone; and yet he was raised up under the providence of God to become the honor of the State and the honor of all the nation, entitled to its love and respect.

Mr. Speaker, I have but few words more to say of our dead friend. I was with him in every contest he had in his district. We traveled together side by side. We communed together upon the great questions that were to be presented, upon the political condition of the country, the legislation that was demanded; and yet, in all the days and nights I was with him, I never heard him say an unkind word of any living man. His heart was spotless and void of offense toward his fellow-men. Abuse and misrepresentation he could trample upon and defy, while still maintaining the purity of his manhood; and it was the white mantle of love which enwrapped him as he lay dead in his home here in Washington. It was the same white mantle of love that enfolded him as we went with his dead body, with swiftly-moving pace, to Lawrence, there to be greeted with lamentations, sighs, and tears by thousands of his old acquaintances who had learned to love him over the loss that had befallen them, and I thought as I stood there and witnessed their grief that they had come to know perhaps for the first time that a great man had fallen in Israel.

There is no question in my mind, Mr. Speaker, as to where his ship is floating to-day. There is no question in my mind as to what harbor it has entered with fluttering sails and flag floating transcendently beautiful. I know, as you know, as we all know—for it is emblazoned in our hearts—that we shall live again. The men who stood with the Republic, who fought for it, who made it, the men who died at Lexington, and those who died with the last shot that was fired at the heart of the nation, are living to-day.

To-day o'er our flag they are keeping
As faithful a guard as of yore.
No sentinel spirit is sleeping,
That pickets the line of the shore.
The voices of music are ringing
In accents of sweetness abroad:
The sanctified army is singing
The praise of America's God!

Friend of my early days, companion, counselor, I greet thee; I greet thee; I greet thee!

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I, too, join my voice with those of his older associates upon this floor to add my testimony in giving emphasis to the sterling and manly character of DUDLEY HASKELL.

My offering of eulogy is very brief and humble, but it certainly is heartfelt. Others who knew him longer and more intimately than I have given us the details of his life's story. What I knew about him I learned mostly by close observation while he was with us and of us. I first knew him in the Union Army. Like myself and all our comrades, he was then a young volunteer. It was during what we of the old "Army of the Frontier" called the Prairie Grove campaign.

Bright, active, brave, and handsome, in the full glory and blush of his early and splendid manhood, I seem to see him now as I saw him then, when in pride and honor and heart's devotion he wore unsoiled his country's uniform of blue.

It was evident to his comrades in those old days, as it was later to those who knew him in this Chamber, that he had courage and integrity in his heart, as he certainly had power on his brow.

I next met him on this floor in the first days of the Forty-seventh Congress. He impressed me always as few men ever did; and as the months wore away close observation convinced me that not only were his intellections keen, not only were his powers great, but that his heart was pure, and his purposes patriotic and as stainless as a star.

How he labored during all of the last session only those can know who like my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] saw him as, day by day, he did a Titan's work, while we shared in his hopes, convictions, and anxiety!

I waive the question whether or not he was right. I believe he was. Yet I sincerely believe he sacrificed his life to the conscientious discharge of duty as he understood it, and from sheer overwork he died in the stern discharge of duty! Can eulogy say more than that?

He believed, with the faith which makes heroes and martyrs, that it is alike wise and patriotic to save the American markets for the handiwork and the wares of American workmen, in order that comfort and plenty may always fill and bless American homes. He believed that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and that "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war."

But, sir, he is dead! The Commonwealth that honored him, as he in his integrity certainly served and honored her, now holds all that is mortal of our friend. His career on earth is ended, as all careers must end! To his widow and now fatherless children he has left a legacy rich in the record of a noble life and a spotless name! "He was born; he died." That, in brief, is the history of man!

But, sir, our friend was a most manly man, because he was a Christian man. He always was ready to spend and be spent in the cause of truth, justice, humanity, and that surely is the cause of Christ!

As I think of him in the plenitude of his power on this floor as a debater and as a law-maker, and remember that he is gone, the lines of Barry Cornwall rise unbidden to memory:

Day dawned! Within a curtained room,
Filled to faintness with perfume,
A lady lay at point of doom.

Day closed! A child had seen the light;
But for that lady, fair and bright,
She slumbered in unending night.

Springs rose! And by her grave so green
A little boy, with thoughtful mien,
On summer eves was often seen.

Years passed! He grew in manly grace,
He mingled in the world's rough race,
And won himself a lofty place.

And then he died. Behold before ye
Humanity's poor sum and story,
Life, death, and all there is of glory!

Sir, within the sacred precincts of that desolate home in Kansas I would not presume to enter an uninvited and an unknown guest. To the widow in her weeds, whom I never saw, I can only say, Look up! Dear old Whittier has, in his desolation, penned these lines:

And yet, dear heart! remembering thee,
Am I not richer than of old?
Safe in thy immortality,
What change can reach the wealth I hold?
What chance can mar the pearl and gold
Thy love hath left in trust with me?
And while in life's late afternoon,
Where cool and long the shadows grow,
I walk to meet the night, which soon
Shall shape and shadow overflow,
I can not feel that thou art far,
Since near at need the angels are.
And when the sunset gates unbar,
Shall I not see thee waiting stand,
And white against the evening star
The welcome of thy beckoning hand?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, on the 23d day of March, 1842, DUDLEY CHASE HASKELL was born in the quiet village of Springfield, in the State of Vermont, and removing with his parents to the Territory of Kansas when but thirteen years old, he grew into a strong, sturdy, athletic, vigorous man, and seven years ago, with long strides and strong arms, he entered this Chamber to assume the duties and take upon himself the responsibilities of a legislator for this nation.

How ably he performed those duties and how conscientiously he discharged those responsibilities has been attested here to-day; and now, when he should have been but in the prime of life and in the full vigor of his intellect and manhood—when, as life is ordinarily allotted to man, he should have been in his seat looking with conscientious solicitude after the interests of his constituents and the well-being of his country—the busy duties of this House are suspended, the gavel of the Speaker is laid aside, and the acrimonious debate is hushed, that all may certify to the worth and honor of the departed, and that some may laurel his grave with a rhetorical offering of sympathy and affection.

That grim messenger which comes but once to man halted Mr. HASKELL as he was entering Congress for the fourth consecutive term, and bade him give up his duties, set aside his aspirations, forego his interests, bid farewell to friends and loved ones, quit his scenes of home and kindred, and follow him to that silent bourn from which none are permitted to return to tell us of the departed. Why this was none can tell. Why one so young, so devoted to duty, so strong and athletic, so capable of work and accomplishing good, so conscientious and fearless in the denunciation of wrong and in the advocacy of what he believed to be right, so ambitious and desirous of aiding his country and of doing that which would contribute to the happiness of man, should be stricken down and his powers destroyed thus early in his pilgrimage none can tell; and why the final summons should have been served as he was at the vestibule of his usefulness and but rapidly climbing to the apex of his power and opportunity is one of the insoluble problems of mortal life. But thus it is and ever hath been.

Going to Kansas when but thirteen years of age from the green hills and liberty-loving people of Vermont, he became at once interested and aroused for free government on the plains of his newly-adopted home, and the aggressions of the slave power and the efforts of the national administration to fasten African bondage upon the people of the new Territory aroused the vehement opposition of his impassioned nature and called forth every resistance his young but enthusiastic temperament could command. He witnessed the violence and turbulence of that contest, and love for freedom and hatred of slavery and human bondage grew into every muscle and fiber of his being and became a constituent part of his manhood, and when that contest was followed by war against his country—when States were shooting from their political orbits like erratic meteors from the sky; when the wild alarm of war was sounded and the drum-beat was marshaling the loyal legions to stay the fratricidal hands raised for the overthrow of our Government—DUDLEY C. HASKELL tendered his services to his country, and in a humble and subordinate capacity did what he could to nationalize liberty, extirpate slavery, and preserve his country.

But all those days of mingled light and shadow, of hope and fears, of great virtues and great sins are gone, and how our hearts should overrun with gratitude that the nation needs no more sacrifices for such a conflict, but asks now for a common brotherhood, moved by Christian charity and bound together and cemented by good deeds.

And perhaps in years not far away the vanquished—the South herself—when she shall look with pride upon her enlarged cities and new industries and upon her increased millions, rich, free, and happy, as her sky is gentle, blue, and propitious, will count among her friends those who wore the blue and seemed to her such reckless enemies, as they struggled to preserve the Government for freedom and to break the chains that held the bondman as a slave.

When Mr. HASKELL quit the service of his country in the field, he went to Williston's seminary, at Easthampton, Mass., to continue his education, and concluded it by a scientifice course at Yale.

In December, 1865, he was married at Stockbridge, Berkshire County, Massachusetts, to Miss Hattie Kelsey, an accomplished and cultured descendant of Cotton Mather, who with two little girls are left to survive him.

Almost immediately after he was married Mr. HASKELL returned to his prairie home and engaged in business, but he took a deep interest in local concerns and interests, and in those social, economical, and political problems which lay at the foundation of our Government, and being a clear thinker, a ready and aggressive debater, and a courteous and intelligent controversialist, it was not long until he found himself in the front rank of local politics, and in 1872 he was elected to the Legislature of his State.

But his political and business experiences have been given by my colleague and I will not enlarge upon them. His labors, his growth, his accomplishments as a member of the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, and Forty-seventh Congresses are known to many of you and have been commented upon to-day. Of temperate habits, of untiring industry, and possessing a splendid physical organization, and moved by an honorable ambition to excel, he did not realize there was a limit to his powers of endurance or to his physical capacity for work, and being poor, he attempted almost unaided to do that which no member of this Chamber can do and live—to run all the errands and look after the wants and correspondence of a very large and exacting constituency, and yet perform in a competent and thoroughly intelligent manner the demanding and multitudinous duties of this House; and the chair of DUDLEY C. HASKELL is vacant to-day and his body moldering in sepulchral dust from overwork; crushed by the exacting demands and labor of his position as was the Trojan priest of Neptune, Laocoon, and his children, crushed by the serpents of Tenedos.

Throngs gathered in the courts of Hypatia discussing "What am I, and whence came I?" and from that Grecian culture to the present the generations have discoursed that more inscrutable question still, "Whither go I?"

But not so with him whom we mourn to-day.

Born of Christian parents, his convictions were formed in early years and strengthened with his growth. He believed in the Carpenter of Nazareth, in the divinity of Christ, in the immortality of the soul, in the resurrection, and the better life. To him the accomplishments of man, the monumental glories we have won, were not given to or secured by a race of descendants who trace their genealogy to gibbering specimens of the animal kingdom or to the lower strata of animal life; but to beings "little less than the angels," who shall find incorruption and immortality when the corruptible mortal nature is laid aside weary and exhausted in the work of life. Mr. HASKELL was but little given to abstractions and speculations; to him practice was worth more than theory, and in the investigation and consideration of the economic questions of the day he preferred to ascertain and heed results rather than indulge in theorizing and philosophical speculation regardless of consequences.

As has been already said, he possessed a fine physique, and when he first entered this Chamber he was the picture of health and physical vigor. As was eloquently said of him by his pastor in this city in the brief exercises had on the morning the cortége moved for his Western home, "he was 6 feet 3 inches tall, but every inch a man."

Springing from the masses, his sympathies were with the laboring people and his heart beat responsive to their importunities; but for all he only desired that which was right, and in all the relations of life, as day-laborer, as soldier, as scholar, as business man, as politician, as statesman, he stood by his convictions, and died as he had lived—an honest man. How tersely he expressed this characteristic of his life when, in almost the last conversation he had with his devoted friend Hon. Ed. H. Smith, of Kansas, who had been clerk of the Committee on Indian Affairs—the committee of which Mr. HASKELL was chairman—he said, "I tell you, Ed., it pays to be honest, and I thank God my hands are clean."

But it was as husband and father that Mr. HASKELL excelled. Kind and devoted, it was at the family hearthstone with wife and little ones that he shone resplendent. There he should have been seen and known to have been fully appreciated. There his feelings were full of tenderness and his face laughed as with the joys of early life, "when the days are all sunny and the months all June," and there hearts throb for him that now must bleed until they too are summoned to share with him the ecstacies of a better land.

But I will not rend the vail and trespass upon the sanctity of that beautiful home-life except to call your attention to the weeping wife and desolate children as they sit in the prairie home he loved so well, cherishing the ashes of the departed, and weeping for him who comes not. How inexpressibly sad is their condition in weeds and mourning these cheerless days of winter when contrasted with that of October last, when they left home cheerful, buoyant, hopeful, happy, expecting that with a little rest and relaxation in the hills of New England the bloom of health would return to his cheeks and elasticity to his steps, and they would witness him, as he grew in strength and usefulness during this session of Congress, gaining new laurels, achieving new triumphs, and adding new honors to his already distinguished name.

For six years I, in common with the people of the second district of Kansas, was honored by our Representative upon the floor of this House; and as a constituent who knew him well, who respected his integrity and worth, who admired his capacity and sincerity, who sympathized with him in his political convictions and affiliations, and who competed with him for the honor of representing the district in the convention in which he was first nominated for Congress, I, in conclusion of these exercises, pay this feeble tribute to his worth with a tear of sympathy and regret at our irreparable loss.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted.

And, in accordance with the last resolution, the House (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 29, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, submitting a report from Maj. G. L. Gillespie of an examination and survey of North River in front of Jersey City and Hoboken, made in compliance with the requirements of the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882, to determine what is necessary to permanently deepen the channel on the New Jersey side; which, together with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 6th instant, a report of the Chief of Engineers showing the number, pay, station, and duties of civilian engineers employed by the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter, with the accompanying papers, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONGER. My recollection is that the inquiry in relation to the number, pay, station, and duties of the civil engineers employed by the Government had reference to civil engineers engaged on the river and harbor improvements of the country. If this reply is in that respect it should go to the Committee on Commerce. I do not know particularly what the report refers to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it refers to civil engineers employed on the river and harbor works of the United States, and with the consent of the Senate he will change the reference to the Committee on Commerce. The Chair was at first under the impression that it related to the military establishment proper.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I present a petition of the common council of Duluth, Minn., praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of Duluth Harbor. As the petition sets forth in very comprehensive terms the present facilities of that harbor and its important relations to transportation affecting the Northwest, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

The common council of Duluth, Minn., respectfully present to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States Congress—

That the port of Duluth is now the outlet to cheap water transportation for the agricultural products of Minnesota and large portions of Iowa, Nebraska, and Dakota, and for the mineral products of Montana and Idaho.

That besides the saving in freights made on the actual amounts shipped from Duluth, the existence of this port fixes the rates at which all competitive lines of transportation must carry produce from those States and Territories, and thus regulates prices on vast amounts of grain and other articles to the great benefit of the whole Northwest.

That Government improvements at the Sault Sainte Marie River have now rendered it possible for the largest class of steamers and other vessels to come into Lake Superior and carry cargoes to the seaboard at a minimum cost, and if this harbor be equally improved, so that these vessels may be loaded to their full capacity, the farmers of the Northwest and the consumers in Eastern States will then have the full benefit of those improvements already made by Government at Sainte Marie River, Detroit River, and other points on the lake route.

That a difference of one foot in the depth of the harbor at Duluth permits so much additional cargo to be loaded on a vessel that it makes a decided difference in freight rates, not only on the 7,000,000 bushels of grain shipped from Duluth in 1883, but in many millions transported eastward by other States. No appropriation made by Congress can show a greater proportionate return or more far-reaching effects than the one for this harbor.

We therefore present the following brief statistics, and urge an appropriation of the full amount recommended by the engineer in charge for use the present season:

Tonnage of the port of Duluth for 1883	tons...	1,264,494
Shipments of wheat and wheat reduced to flour	bushels...	9,392,219
Receipts by lake of return supplies	tons...	508,460

This is conclusive proof that the port of Duluth is of practical value and use to a great population, and its improvement proper and wise.

By order of the council.

[SEAL.]

CHAS. E. BUDDIN, Village Recorder.
C. H. GRAVES, Mayor.

Mr. GORMAN presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Baltimore, Md., praying for the establishment of a light-ship off Smith's Island, Cape Charles shoals; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER. I present the petition of Enoch Ridgway, of Washington, D. C., praying compensation for service rendered the Federal Government during the war. As the petition involves a military question, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. I present the petition of John H. Stewart, of Walnut Ridge, Ark., who says that he was entitled to a bounty under a certain act of Congress, but failing to apply for it before the 1st of July, 1880, he was barred. He asks now that the limitation of such act be removed, and that he be declared entitled to the bounty. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. I present a letter addressed to me by W. P. Grace, of Pine Bluff, Ark., setting forth certain facts touching the necessity of work to be done on the Arkansas River at or near the town of Pine Bluff. It states facts that make it become properly a petition or memorial. I ask that it may be considered as a petition for the purpose of its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas presents a paper, the nature of which he has stated, for reference to the Committee on Commerce. If there be no objection it will be received and so referred.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present the official report of the proceedings at a meeting of Sion S. Post, No. 40, Department of Indiana, Grand Army of the Republic, located at Fort Wayne, Ind., demanding the equalization of bounties and other measures of relief which they specify, and I ask the reference of the paper to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the paper the Senator from Indiana present a petition?

Mr. VOORHEES. It is the official proceedings of the post, addressed to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to present the official proceedings of the Grand Army post that he has named, for reference to the Committee on Military Affairs. If there be no objection the paper will be received and so referred.

Mr. HALE. I present resolutions in the nature of a memorial to Congress, though not exactly in proper form, adopted by the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Maine, in favor of certain legislation in regard to pensions and bounties, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent to present a paper on the subject of pensions and bounties, the nature of which he has stated. If there be no objection it will be received and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GROOME presented additional papers to accompany the bill (S. 578) for the relief of Dennis W. Mullan; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 820) to authorize the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company to construct one or more bridges across the Willamette River, in the State of Oregon, and to establish them as post-roads, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Territories, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 1682) to enable the people of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of the State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. HARRISON, recommitted to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which Senate Executive Document No. 25, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, was referred, and in regard to which they reported the bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations, have instructed me to report amendments to that bill, which have been suggested in consequence of a report from the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I ask that the amendments, with the accompanying report, be printed, as offered by the committee, to accompany the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 812) for the relief of certain citizens of the United States and occupants of lands within one mile of the military post of Camp Independence, Inyo County, California, have instructed me to report it back to the Senate and ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, because the committee have already reported a Senate bill providing for the disposition of abandoned and useless military reservations. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2309) to authorize the Secretary of War to cause the remains of Capt. Walter Clifford, deceased, to be transported to his late place of residence, and making appropriation therefor, have instructed me to report it back with a request that the bill and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

This is done in consequence of the recommendations of the Secretary of War and the course of the Senate in similar cases. The Adjutant-General in a report to the Secretary of War says:

Since 1878 Congress has authorized and provided for the transportation of the remains of deceased officers in the following cases:

First. The act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government, approved June 20, 1878, appropriated $5,000 for disinterring and removing to national military cemeteries the remains of officers of the Army who fell in battle or died on the frontier and whose remains have not been removed to the States.

Second. The act making appropriation for the sundry civil expenses of the Government, approved March 3, 1879, appropriated $300 for the transportation to Jacksonville, Ill., of the remains of Lieut. William L. English, Seventh Infantry, who died at Deer Lodge, Mont., of wounds received in action with Indians.

Third. The act of Congress approved February 17, 1880, appropriated $1,000 for the transportation from Fort Brown, Tex., to West Point, N. Y., of the remains of Maj. Gen. George Sykes, colonel Twentieth Infantry.

Fourth. The act of Congress approved January 31, 1884, authorized the payment from the appropriation for contingencies of the Army of the expenses of removal of the remains of the late Major-General Ord from Havana, Cuba, to Washington, D. C.

The committee report back the bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations with a recommendation that the Committee on Appropriations insert in the proper bill an appropriation sufficient to accomplish this purpose, because if Congress assumes jurisdiction to pass upon individual cases of this kind we shall be flooded with from ten to fifteen, twenty or thirty each year asking for special legislation, and they can all be amply provided for on the appropriation bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Military Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations if there be no objection.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 91) for the relief of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAMPTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1311) vacating all that portion of the Fort Randall military reservation, in the Territory of Dakota, lying east of the Missouri River, to report it adversely and move its indefinite postponement. I will state for the information of the Senator who introduced the bill [Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin] that the committee report it adversely not because they are opposed to the action contemplated, but simply because the committee have already reported a general bill for all abandoned reservations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. LOGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of War, recommending that the sum of $15,000 be appropriated for the purchase of land near Atlanta, Ga., on which it is proposed to erect buildings and establish a military post, $100,000 being asked for this purpose, to report it from that committee with a recommendation that the letter be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and that that committee grant the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Military Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration of the subject and the letter will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, if there be no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments. I give notice to the Senate that I shall call the bill up the first opportunity after it is printed and shall ask the consideration of it.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1553) to remove the charge of desertion against David Wood, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 869) to vacate an alley in square 234 in the city of Washington, reported it without amendment.

SOUTHERN CYCLONE SUFFERERS.

Mr. RANSOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back to the Senate the joint resolution (S. R. 65) for the relief of sufferers by the storm of February 19, 1884, in the States of North Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, and appropriating $100,000 therefor.

I wish to say to the Senate that upon a very careful consideration of this resolution by the committee, at the request of the committee telegrams were sent to the governors of the different States mentioned in the resolution and to other persons in those States supposed to be best acquainted with all the incidents of the storm and the subsequent suffering. These telegrams from the governors of those States and from other best-informed persons developed the fact that while the destruction of life and property was very great and while the suffering has been extreme and intense with certain communities in those States and along the track of the storm and there is still great suffering, that suffering and peril in the judgment of the committee is not of that widespread, transcendent, and paramount character of impending ruin which baffles all local, individual, municipal, and State relief and demands for the preservation of its citizens the intervention of the Government. Under that state of facts as developed by those telegrams the committee have instructed me to report the joint resolution back to the Senate.

I can not let the occasion pass without saying that while I trust I was prompted by a becoming and proper impulse to introduce the resolution, it is certainly becoming and proper now that the country should know at the earliest reasonable moment that Congress will not take steps for the relief of those afflicted people; and I do this so that that great charity which has been so nobly exerted in their behalf, private and local charity along that line of ruin and in those States, may not be suspended or halted in its good work.

I hope I may be permitted to say here in regard to the people in those States, in this great ordeal of intense suffering and almost ruin, after an unusual dearth of crops in the last year and after many years of yet greater calamity, that their example of self-denial and self-resolution and self-dependence in this sternest trial must command the admiration of their countrymen everywhere.

I may be carried away sometimes by enthusiasm for my own people, but when we look at what has taken place with the people of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, and see their firm resolution to abide their fate and resist the temptation to come to Congress for relief, even when an effort has been made to give it to them, it does remind me of the best days of Fabricius and Regulus and of that great Athenian who sacrificed everything that he might stand by his principles.

I hope in the vicissitudes which may come—which I trust will not come but may come—upon the different sections of this great people that this noble example of the people of four Southern States will be a lesson to be followed by communities richer and more powerful but which have not been more afflicted.

I have to thank the Committee on Appropriations, being a member of it, for the very careful consideration they have manifested toward me and my people in their examination of this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition does the Senator from North Carolina desire to have made of the joint resolution?

Mr. RANSOM. It may be laid on the table or indefinitely postponed.

Mr. GARLAND. As well as I could hear the remarks made by the Senator from North Carolina in reporting the joint resolution back, I take it that the committee acted simply upon the ground that they did not consider from the information they had that there was a necessity for the interposition of Congress for the relief of these people.

Mr. RANSOM. I will say to my friend from Arkansas that I attempted to make that very clear.

Mr. GARLAND. That is what I understood. I do not understand the Senator as representing that the committee reported that they thought Congress had no authority to make this appropriation.

Mr. RANSOM. Very, very far from it, sir.

Mr. GARLAND. Because, whatever action is taken upon it, I do not want it to go out of the Senate or to be tabled or postponed with any idea that I agree to the notion that Congress has not got the authority to make this appropriation. I think Congress has, and I was in hopes that we should get a favorable report from the committee, so that when that question came up it could be established that we have the power.

I do not wish to interfere with the disposition of the joint resolution of the Senator from North Carolina, but I wish to say that taking the report of the committee as it is made upon his statement, I am willing that it shall be indefinitely postponed; but if it should go upon the other proposition, I could not consent to the action until I should be heard upon it.

Mr. RANSOM. I could not consistently, after having introduced the joint resolution, have made a report from the committee which would have condemned the principle on which I introduced it. I know this is not the time to discuss the constitutionality or the propriety of such a measure. Whenever that time shall come, in my judgment and I believe in the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations, there can be but one opinion on that question, sustained by a line of precedents from the beginning of the Government to this hour, and that is, that whenever in the judgment of Congress there is such widespread distress and suffering and such imminent and impending ruin to the people of any section of this country that local and State aid cannot relieve it, it is the duty of the Government to save the lives of their people. In my judgment the power is unquestioned, but there should be the greatest discretion and an undoubted necessity in its exercise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the joint resolution will be indefinitely postponed.

NAVY DEPARTMENT LIBRARY.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the bill (S. 1199) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes,'" approved June 20, 1878, to report it without amendment, to recommend its passage, and to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It amends the act approved June 20, 1878, by adding to the clause relating to the binding of books for the Departments of the Government, after the words "Congressional Library," the words: "Nor to the library of the Navy Department;" so as to read: "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, approved June 20, 1878, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding to the clause of said act relating to the binding of books for the Departments of the Government, after the words 'Congressional Library,' the following words: 'Nor to the library of the Navy Department.'"

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to the bill, but if I understand its provisions, should they not apply to the libraries of all the Departments? It relates to the manner of binding books?

Mr. ANTHONY. It relates to the manner of binding books. It has already been applied to the Library of Congress, to the library of the State Department, to the library of the Patent-Office Bureau, and I believe to the libraries of several other Departments. The object of the measure is to remove a restriction upon binding books for the libraries of the Departments.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understand.

Mr. ANTHONY. The present law forbids the binding of any books except in a peculiar way, in cloth, and that is found to be altogether insufficient for books of reference. Moreover there are numbers of series of books that are already bound in a particular way, and it is desirable that the style of binding should be continued in the numbers of the same series for the present and the future.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree that the bill ought to pass. I only suggest to the Senator that it might be well to enlarge it so as to apply to all the Departments; but I do not press that view.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we might as well wait until the other Departments ask for it. It already applies to several of the Departments, I think to most of them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Since the attention of the Senate is called to the object of the bill, I would rather have it lie over, for the reason that my attention has been called to the fact that in several bureaus and Departments of the Government the power to bind books for their libraries was grossly abused at one time. It was very largely abused by binding in the most expensive manner, binding special copies of the ordinary reports of Congress, which are very rarely read after the first year. It was abused in several of the subordinate bureaus of the Departments. Attention was called to it, and Congress checked that abuse. If this opens the door again to allow the head of a bureau or the librarian in charge of one of the Department libraries to order books to be bound in an unusually expensive manner, as was done, it ought to be corrected. While a reasonable latitude ought to be allowed, it seems to me there ought to be some limitation on the power of the head of a bureau or even the head of a Department as to binding documents for presentation copies, for example, in an unusually expensive manner. I should like to look at the bill, as it is just reported, so that if any amendment is necessary I may offer it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think my friend from Ohio will find that no amendment of that kind is necessary. This bill does not open the abuse which formerly prevailed and which he very properly rebukes, of binding expensively ordinary documents for presentation copies; but it applies only to books for the libraries of Departments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not for distribution?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not for distribution; only for the libraries of Departments.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is, the libraries kept in the Departments?

Mr. ANTHONY. The libraries kept in the Departments, books for the purpose of reference, to which constant reference is made.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that at all.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is all the bill applies to.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the statement made by the Senator from Rhode Island that the bill only applies to books kept for the benefit of the Department libraries and not for distribution and only the ordinary copies for the libraries, I have no objection to it and will let it pass. I will not ask that the bill go over.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 1683) for the relief of Lieut. N. C. Ridenour; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1684) for the relief of Clement A. Lounsberry; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1685) for the relief of Edmund Wolf; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1686) to amend an act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River opposite to or within the corporate limits of Nebraska City, Nebr., approved June 4, 1872; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ANTHONY. I presented a petition some time ago from J. Madison Cutts, asking to be restored to the Army and placed upon the retired-list with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and with it the draught of a bill, which went with the petition and papers to the Committee on Military Affairs. At his request I introduce the bill in form, so that it may be printed.

The bill (S. 1687) authorizing the President to appoint and retire J. Madison Cutts as a lieutenant-colonel, United States Army, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1688) for the relief of George W. Osborne; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1689) for the relief of J. B. Fletcher; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 1690) to incorporate the Interoceanic Ship Railway Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. GORMAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of E. H. Wardwell be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, it was Ordered, That the papers on the files of the Senate in the case of George W. Saulpaw be referred to the Committee on Claims.

PORTRAIT OF ZACHARY TAYLOR.

Mr. VOORHEES. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of purchasing the portrait of Zachary Taylor, late President of the United States, now the property of his daughter, Mrs. Dandridge, and in the custody of the Corcoran Art Gallery.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. PLATT. I ask the Senator who presented the resolution to make some explanation respecting it, for the reason that I find in the room of the Committee on Patents, the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, a portrait of Zachary Taylor, I do not know by whom painted or when placed there. I presume that is not the portrait to which the resolution refers.

Mr. VOORHEES. In answer to the Senator from Connecticut I will simply state that I have been informed by very excellent people that there is a likeness of General Taylor, the property of Mrs. Dandridge, formerly Mrs. Bliss, his daughter, in the Corcoran Art Gallery at this time. The portrait of General Taylor now at the White House is regarded as a very inferior work of art and does him very great injustice. The resolution simply directs the Committee on the Library to inquire into the expediency and propriety of purchasing the portrait which is indicated by the resolution, but I can not answer the Senator from Connecticut about the portrait in the room of the Committee on Patents. I did not know there was one there. I will take great pleasure in visiting the room and seeing it. This is a harmless resolution, directing the inquiry to be made.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE JACKSON PAPERS.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas a large and valuable collection of original manuscript papers was confided by General Andrew Jackson in his lifetime to Amos Kendall for the specific purpose of enabling said Kendall to prepare a history of General Jackson and his times, conditioned also that if the said Kendall should fail to accomplish the work indicated then said papers were to pass into the hands of Francis P. Blair, sr., for the same purpose; and

Whereas said Kendall did not prepare said history, and said papers passed at his death into the custody of said Blair, according to the directions made by General Jackson; and

Whereas the said Blair also failed to execute the work intrusted to his care, leaving said papers at the time of his death unused and unpublished: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of purchasing said collection of papers from General Jackson's legal heirs, and having the same edited and published as the property of the Government for the use of the Congressional Library.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. PLUMB submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he hereby is, directed to furnish to the Senate at his earliest convenience—

First. A statement of all information in his Department derived from correspondence with the representatives of this Government in foreign countries, or otherwise, regarding the average amount of wheat, rye, corn, and cotton produced, consumed in, exported from, and imported into such countries, each respectively, with the surplus, if any, therein at the end of the crop year 1882.

Second. The amount produced in each of such countries from the crops of 1883, with the probable surplus or deficiency therein during that crop year.

Third. The probable requirements of such products from this country to meet the necessities of such countries, respectively, before the crops of 1884 are ready to market. Also any other information in his possession of interest to American producers and consumers regarding the questions referred to in this resolution, and especially whether political or other complications in or between foreign countries, or other causes of like character, are likely to occur in the near future calculated to influence the market value of American produce or its cost to consumers.

Fourth. To furnish the amounts herein asked for in bushels as per American measurement.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 186) for the relief of Frank Galt; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ADDITIONAL STEEL VESSELS.

Mr. HALE. It is so near 1 o'clock that I think nothing can be done before that time with the Calendar. I move therefore that we proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 698) to authorize the construction of additional steel vessels for the Navy.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. HALE. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey be read and then the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments referred to will be read, first that proposed by the Senator from New Jersey on the left of the Chair [Mr. SEWELL] and second that proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of Mr. SEWELL was to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 3. That the vessels authorized by this act shall be constructed at one or more of the most suitable navy-yards of the Government, under the supervision of the proper officers of the Navy: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may be authorized by the President to procure the machinery for said vessels from parties engaged in the business of constructing naval machinery, the lowest responsible bidder to be accepted, after three months' advertisement in the principal newspapers of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and San Francisco, payments to be made as the work progresses; but at no time shall it amount to within 25 per cent. of the value of the work and material, which amount of the contract price shall be retained by the Secretary of the Navy until final completion and acceptance of the contract.

The amendment to the amendment is to add:

That the construction of said vessels shall be apportioned between the following navy-yards, under the direction of the President of the United States, to wit, League Island, Mare Island, Norfolk, Pensacola, Washington, and Brooklyn.

Mr. HALE. I only wish to say a word. I do not think that many Senators on reflection will decide to vote for the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. The upshot of that would be that as a first movement hundreds of thousands of dollars would need to be expended upon the navy-yards in order to put them in condition to do this work. Hundreds and thousands of men would need to be employed on those navy-yards in the preliminary work necessary before a single blow could be struck in the way of building the hulls of these ships, for we have never with one exception built an iron ship in our navy-yards; it is all a new and untried field and involves great expenditure. To say nothing of the delays that would result from this, the increased expenditure would be enormous. And there is one other consideration that I wish to present to Senators——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to ask him a question? Does it not simply enlarge the option for building these vessels? It simply provides that the President may do the work at the navy-yards.

Mr. HALE. I was going to say that under the present law and under the amendment adopted yesterday to regulate and control the building the discretion is left to the President to utilize the navy-yards so far as he may deem it advisable and judicious. He has that authority already, as I explained yesterday to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]; but if this amendment should prevail it would have the effect of an expression of the Senate in favor of that policy, and would undoubtedly leave the Executive in no such untrammeled condition as he is now, and I do not want that done.

The other consideration that I was going to present to Senators is this: For the last year or two certainly an attempt has been faithfully made to keep these navy-yards apart from any of the complaints or scandals or alleged scandals against them in years past. There has been complaint, I do not say whether ill-founded or well-founded, of these yards being used for political purposes. Now, I do not want in this year, a Presidential year, that there shall be any opportunity left for men to find fault in this regard. I would be glad if these navy-yards for the whole of the season coming could be found with only a few men there necessary to do the routine work of the repairing that is necessary to the boats and of keeping up the yards themselves and no more than that; for I do know that if these ships are put into these yards and the yards have to be fitted up, with hundreds and thousands of men in them, there will be no end to the complaints that will be made. The Secretary may do his best and may try not to be controlled by political influences and may not be controlled by political influences, but the burden of complaint will be heard everywhere that the yards are being used for political purposes.

I trust, as I said in the beginning, that but few Senators, on reflection, will hamper this bill by the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator means the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, it seems to me that the argument against building these vessels in the Government navy-yards is just about as strong as the argument I heard advanced a few days ago against having them built by an individual; that somebody is apprehensive that some scandal will ensue.

Now, sir, I for one am in favor of building all the war vessels that any Senator here will introduce a bill for within the surplus money in the Treasury of the United States. I would vote to-day to expend the last dollar not required for the actual support of this Government to construct a navy, but I would like to hear some other reason advanced against building these ships in the navy-yards than that some one is afraid that somebody or some party will be scandalized by it.

I care not, sir, whether Mr. Roach shall build them or whether they shall be built at Pensacola or at Norfolk; but I do think that we might give the option to the Secretary of the Navy, or to somebody else if you please, to construct these vessels in the navy-yards or by contract. I can not see why we should be confined to either one or the other, contract or the navy-yards. Let us have both. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, and I can not see wherein it will affect the purpose of this bill, which if it means anything means the construction of a navy. That is the only matter that is before the Senate, whether we shall or shall not construct these vessels; and if we shall, then the other question is, as raised by that amendment, whether the Government can do it herself or whether we must be confined to the contract system. I can see no harm to ensue, I can see nothing that can hurt this bill, by the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] had to go home to-day and he left a request that I would take his amendment in charge. I had not yesterday expressed a positive opinion that the amendment would be wise in the form in which the Senator from New Jersey presented it.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] yesterday called the attention of the Senate to the existing statutes, in two laws passed by the last Congress, giving authority to build the vessels that are now under construction and also prescribing the manner in which they shall be constructed. I then thought, and I think still, that it is unfortunate that the committee did not re-embody those statutes, so far as they are applicable to the proposed work, in the bill, so that the Senate might have an opportunity to modify those statutes in such form as experience has indicated to be necessary. I am now having those statutes copied with a view of having them inserted in this bill, so that when this bill becomes a law, if it ever shall, you can take it by its four corners and understand how much of the law, and in what form, is applicable to the proposed building of these war vessels.

I concur in the opinion expressed in this amendment by the Senator from New Jersey, not only that our navy-yards are capable of being very easily adapted to the building of iron or steel ships, but also that it is our duty at least to fit up one of them, if no more, for that purpose, putting in them all the necessary machinery and appliances for the building of at least the hulls of these ships. I would extend it also to the machinery of the vessels.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, the Secretary of the Navy, the advisory board, and all others concerned in promoting the present plan of building these ships seem entirely to have ignored an inquiry into the real capacity of our navy-yards for their construction. As I remarked yesterday in calling attention to the brief observations of Admiral Porter, they were all that I could find in the testimony accompanying the report of the committee upon the subject of the capacity of the navy-yards for the construction of these ships. I think, sir, that I may assume that no real inquiry has been made into that subject by the committee, and that we are left here now to what I consider a rather uncertain declaration of the chairman of that committee in charge of the bill as to what would be the cost of fitting up the navy-yards, or some of them, for the purpose of constructing these ships.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me to interrupt him just there, I will state to him a conversation that I had with the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, Mr. Wilson. Not as representing the committee in any way, but in the course of a conversation with him, I referred to the subject-matter which the Senator is now discussing. I asked him the direct question whether or not there were one or two or more navy-yards belonging to the United States where a ship could be completed out and out. His reply to me was that there was no such navy-yard. I then asked him the question what amount of money it would require to put the navy-yards in a condition to build the ships from beginning to end, and he said in reply that he thought with $150,000 he could buy the tools necessary to build a ship for the Navy. Although this is unofficial, I have no doubt it is entirely trustworthy; and so it seems that there is not a navy-yard to-day in the United States where a ship can be built from beginning to end.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, there are no special facilities in our navy-yards for the fastening together of the hulls of steel or iron ships. It requires, I am told, a peculiar sort of riveting machinery, and it requires some machinery also to punch the plates which we perhaps are not provided with, though I saw a very splendid punch the other day at the navy-yard here, quite new, and that could not have cost less I think than $20,000.

Now, sir, what I was remarking upon, and I think I might remark upon it also in the nature of a complaint against the Navy Department at least, was the fact that no information has been given to the Senate of an official character, nor has any evidence been extracted from any man who was before the Committee on Naval Affairs, to show us what would be the cost, for instance, of fitting up the Norfolk navy-yard so that iron and steel ships could be built there.

Mr. BUTLER. This gentleman said $150,000 would buy the tools.

Mr. MORGAN. I speak now of official information. I am very glad to accept the statement of the Senator from South Carolina, based on that of Mr. Wilson, that it would cost $150,000 to fit up—I will take it that the Norfolk navy-yard could be fitted up for that purpose with that sum of money.

Now, sir, I insist that it is the duty of Congress to make that expenditure, whether a ship shall ever be built there or not; and that because it gives us the advantage of having the navy-yards compete in the market with Mr. Roach and Mr. Cramp; and by looking at the appropriation bills under which the Chicago and the other ships are now being constructed the Senate will see that no one is permitted to take a contract for the building of these ships unless at the time that the contracts are let he has a ship-yard fully equipped in every particular for the building of these ships. Nothing is left open by that act to the enterprise of capitalists or mechanics or ship-builders in the preparation necessary to put any ordinary ship-yard into condition to build these ships. I read the language of the law:

> And the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to construct said vessels and procure their armament at a total cost for each not exceeding the amounts estimated by the naval advisory board in said report, and in the event that such vessels or any of them shall be built by contract, such building shall be under contracts with the lowest and best responsible bidder or bidders, made after at least sixty days' advertisement, published in five of the leading newspapers of the United States, inviting proposals for constructing said vessels, subject to all such rules, regulations, superintendence, and provisions as to bonds and security for the due completion of the work as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe; and no such vessel shall be accepted unless completed in strict conformity with the contract, with the advice and assistance of the naval advisory board, and in all respects in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 5, 1882, except as they are hereby modified; and the authority to construct the same shall take effect at once; and the Secretary of the Navy may, in addition to the appropriation hereby made, apply to the constructing and finishing of the vessels in this clause referred to any balance of the appropriation made to the Bureaus of Construction and Repair and Steam-Engineering for the current fiscal year or in the present act which may remain available for that purpose: Provided, That he shall utilize the national navy-yards, with the machinery, tools, and appliances belonging to the Government there in use in the building of said ships, or any parts thereof, as fully and to as great an extent as the same can be done with advantage to the Government.

The other act which is referred to in this bill provides that these contracts shall be let out to those who have ship-yards already fully equipped for the purpose of constructing these iron or steel ships.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. The amendment proposed authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to proceed upon either of two methods of constructing the vessels, one through the Government navy-yards and the other by private contract. Now if it be the policy of the Government to reconstruct our navy-yards, which are in a dilapidated condition, would it not be best to strike out the last method? Or if it be the policy to let the ships out to private contract, would it not be best to strike out the first, to strike out the clause as to navy-yards? If we intend to adopt the policy of building our own ships in our own yards, we had better limit it to that. If it is our policy to abandon the navy-yards, we had better do so expressly.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it is not for a man as uninformed as I am about naval construction to give any satisfactory answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Texas. I can only say this, that as a business transaction the Government of the United States ought to be a competitor for the building of these ships, and in order to become a competitor it must be prepared to build them. To do that we must make some appropriation to the navy-yards, and I was proceeding to show how the two laws under which these ships are being constructed first placed the power of making the contract only in the hands of those who had ship-yards fully equipped for the purpose, and secondly under the section of the law which I have just read how the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, as I understand it, to take the machinery out of any navy-yard in the United States and lend it to these contractors for the purpose of building their ships under private contract.

That is a very liberal provision, but it all cuts against the United States, it all puts the United States entirely out of the market as a constructor of naval vessels; and why so? The Senator from Maine informs us in a very general statement that the cost of equipping one of these navy-yards for the purpose of building the hulls of iron or steel ships would be very enormous. Now it might be in the imagination of the Senator from Maine very enormous, and yet to a ship-constructor it might be a very small sum. The Senator from South Carolina informs us that Mr. Wilson, the chief naval constructor, says it would cost $150,000 to provide the necessary equipment to put one of these yards in a condition to build these ships.

Mr. BUTLER. I said that Mr. Wilson had informed me that it would require $150,000 to buy the necessary tools. I do not know that he intended that to include the entire preparation for the building of the ships, but he said that it would require that much money to provide the tools, as he expressed it.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, Mr. President, where we have a navy-yard constructed as the one at Norfolk or the one at Washington or the one at Pensacola for the express purpose of building ships, yards at which ships have been built, with ship-houses, with ways already provided, with all the necessary appliances of docks for taking the vessels out of the water, raising them upon the scaffolding, putting them in position to be built or to be repaired—where we have all these, it seems to me idle that we should throw them away or let them lie useless and rot when by an outlay of $150,000 for the purchase of machinery, and I will say $50,000 more, making it $200,000 for the repair and readjustment of those ways and docks and yards—it would be idle and worse than idle for us to throw away these advantages and to retire from competition in the market in respect of the building of these ships, and then to leave it, as we have done under our statutes, to the option of only two or three gentlemen in the United States who are qualified under the law to make contracts for the building of ships.

Now, are there any two yards in the United States, except those of Mr. Cramp and Mr. Roach, where an iron or a steel ship can be built?

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator look at page 58 of the report of the Secretary of the Navy and accompanying documents?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not got that before me. I shall be glad to receive the statement of the Senator from Maine about it.

Mr. HALE. I know the Senator is desirous of getting at what are the real facts. In the documents accompanying the Secretary's report, upon page 54, there is the form of proposals sent out, in which it is stated:

> Proposals will be received either from American ship-builders whose ship-yards are fully equipped for building or repairing iron and steel steamships, or from constructors of marine engines, machinery, and boilers. Satisfactory evidence that the bidders are such builders or constructors must accompany the proposals or be submitted to the Department in advance.
> These vessels are to be built in accordance with all the requirements of the acts of Congress of August 5, 1882, and March 3, 1883.

The statutes to which the Senator refers. Then following is a list of the proposals that were made for each of the ships, the Chicago, the Atlanta, the Boston, and the Dolphin, and in each case there were four bids:

So that there were four actual bids by responsible parties for this work. It does not rest with any two yards in the country, as has evidently been the impression, for here were bids made by very responsible and very well-known parties; and I may say that so well has the work proceeded and so cheap has it been found that steel can be made here in America and the best of this kind of steel for ship-building purposes, that other builders, other enterprises are likely to take courage from it, and I have no apprehension that there will be any lack of competition by different parties seeking earnestly and honestly to do the work for the Government. It is in a better condition than the Senator from Alabama supposes.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator hand me that document?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. I had not examined this report in respect of the biddings for the building of these steel cruisers. It appears now that there were four parties who made biddings, but I believe the contracts were all awarded to one man.

Mr. HALE. The contracts were awarded to the lowest bidder, Mr. Roach, who was some three hundred-odd thousand dollars below the others on all the ships in the aggregate.

Mr. MORGAN—

Proposals will be received—

Says the Secretary of the Navy—

either from American ship-builders whose ship-yards are fully equipped for building or repairing iron and steel steamships, or from constructors of marine engines, machinery, and boilers. Satisfactory evidence that the bidders are such builders or constructors must accompany the proposals or be submitted to the Department in advance.

When we shall have passed this act, I take it for granted that new proposals will go out.

Mr. HALE. Certainly; new proposals in the same form undoubtedly.

Mr. MORGAN. And they will go only to those contractors who can fulfill the conditions required by these regulations and also by the statute; that is to say, they must be persons whose ship-yards are fully equipped for building or repairing iron or steel ships at the time of course that the proposal is made or at the time of its acceptance. They must bring evidence to show that their yards are fully equipped. That is an unfortunate provision in this law, and if the Senator from Maine had spread out in this bill that former statute, which is really a part of this proposed enactment, we should then have had an opportunity to have amended in that particular, and we could provide that any one who will give a guarantee that he will prepare a ship-yard for the purpose of building iron or steel ships—steel ships in this case—within a certain length of time after the proposals are accepted shall be entitled to bid. That would stimulate enterprise on the part of our builders and our capitalists, who, I think, have a considerable disposition to go into this character of business. I hear of Mr. Gorringe, formerly of the Navy, who is building iron ships at a ship-yard somewhere in the vicinity of Philadelphia. I have also been informed recently by a gentleman who said that he was conducting an enterprise of the kind that he intended to build iron ships and was making his preparations to build iron ships at Alexandria, just across the Potomac River.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will allow me a word. The clause from which he has read was not in the law; that was the form of proposal submitted by the Secretary. The law itself is not in that language. That was a matter provided I suppose because the Secretary, as any good business man, did not want to be imposed upon by bids from utterly irresponsible parties, and so he provided that the contract should go to regular builders, persons of reputation, persons who had yards, who had the apparent means to do the work; but I think he did not require that their yards be fully equipped. Any regular establishment anywhere in the country which was doing work of this kind the Secretary would welcome as a bidder. The more he gets the better.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I must differ with the Senator from Maine in respect to what the law is, and while I can not lay my hands upon it at this moment——

Mr. HALE. I have it here.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator read it?

Mr. HALE. It is as follows:

Before any of the vessels hereby authorized shall be contracted for or commenced the Secretary of the Navy shall, by proper public advertisement and notice, invite all engineers and mechanics of established reputation, and all reputable manufacturers of vessels, steam-engines, boilers, and ordnance, having or controlling regular establishments, and being engaged in the business, all officers of the Navy, and especially all naval constructors, steam-engineers, and ordnance officers of the Navy, having plans, models, or designs of any vessels of the classes hereby authorized, or of any part thereof, within any given period, not less than sixty days, to submit the same to said board.

That is the language of the law. There is nothing about their yards being fully equipped or anything of that sort; but it is general and all-embracing.

Mr. MORGAN. There is a still further provision in one of these statutes; and one of the complaints I have to make is that we have not in the law that is proposed to be passed any definite statement of what we are enacting. There is a further enactment, which the Secretary of the Navy has followed literally in making this proposition, otherwise he would be in a very precarious condition, because if without the support of a statute of that kind he undertakes to limit the biddings to that class of men who have their yards already equipped, the intimations or suspicions of frauds which have been thrown out in this debate or in the newspapers of the country would have a remarkably firm footing in that departure of the Secretary of the Navy from the law to give an advantage to his pets and favorites. If the law authorized him to make open propositions to all persons to come in and bid for these ships who might be qualified to construct them, and he limited the bidding to only that class of men whose ship-yards were already fully equipped and prepared, it would be nothing more nor less, it seems to me, than making a very narrow selection on the part of the Secretary of the Navy, and it might very well be imputed to any man under those circumstances that he has transgressed the law for the purpose of giving some advantage to his own favorite friends. I do not think that is the case, however, for, as I remember the statute in another part of it which I have said I can not put my hand on it at this instant of time, it does provide expressly that these contracts shall not be let to other persons than those who have their ship-yards fully equipped and prepared.

In either view of the case, however, there is a narrowing down of competition here to such a small limit as at least to engender in my own mind the apprehension, to say nothing of suspicions that exist elsewhere, that the Government of the United States will be compelled to build these ships at the highest possible cost; for if there be but four men engaged in making the biddings on these ships which are already constructing, we shall have to give a very large credit to the honesty and sincerity of humanity not to suppose that they might be capable of making a combination among themselves to take these biddings at a certain rate mutually agreed upon. If only four men are to control the construction of these steel ships in the United States, and that appears to be the widest range of bidding we have had, we are in a very dangerous attitude in that respect, and it is time that we had taken a little precaution about it, and that we had enlarged the area of this bidding.

I suggest, and I follow the Senator from New Jersey in the suggestion, that the best way to do it is to take a navy-yard—I cite Norfolk, because I have an opinion that that is one of the very best—and equip it with tools and put it in condition that the Government of the United States can go on and build these ships.

Mr. President, the apprehension has also been suggested here that that might become a nest of political evil influence. Why, sir, we may say the same thing as justly of the Post-Office Department or of any other Department of this Government. Who does not know that all postmasters, those of Presidential appointments and those below that, in the United States to-day are appointed with strict and direct reference not merely to politics but to personal politics? Who does not know that every civil appointment that is made in the United States and that has been made in the last six or seven months has reference to an impression that is to be made upon the Chicago Republican convention?

We cannot remedy this by anticipation. The people must take charge of matters of this kind; and when they become informed of this, as I suppose they will, they will resent it and they will redress it; they will correct it in their own primary conventions or at least they will rebuke it at the ballot-box.

But, sir, the whole Government is to be carried along through selected agencies. One hundred and ten thousand office-holders are appointed by the President and by the heads of Departments, &c. These must all be paid. They are all selected from a certain political party. I have no objection to that. I think it is right they should be, since after all the people select them; but we cannot stop in our course of doing our duty to this great Government because the selected agents of the Government may perchance abuse their powers and privileges for personal ends or for political ends. All that we can do is to provide a just and fair system of laws, taking care on our part that they are wisely ordained, and then leave them to the administration of such persons as the people choose to place in office. That is all we can do and we are not expected to do more.

I therefore have no more apprehension of the political influence of the navy-yard at Norfolk or Boston or elsewhere than I would have of John Roach's ship-yard or of Mr. Cramp's ship-yard or of any other ship-yard. The truth is, I have thought that these matters have been very much overstated any way. They do not excite in my mind the deep degree of apprehension that they seem to excite in the minds of many Senators. We put proper checks upon our leading officers, the Secretary of the Navy and all the bureaus connected with the construction of ships, and that is the best that we can do. Suppose they are derelict in their duty, suppose they go to filching from the Treasury, abusing their powers for personal or political influence or to foster the interest of their friends, what is the duty of the American people? What is their privilege under such circumstances? It is to correct the evil; and I will not lend myself to a suspicion in advance against any Department of the Government of the United States, for I know that if these Departments go astray and do wrong against the people and the Government there is a correcting power which the people themselves will summarily exercise. Now, therefore, the argument against the rehabilitation of the navy-yards for the purpose of constructing iron or steel ships is not a sound one when it rests upon the hypothesis that the powers thus granted are to be abused.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me, I should like to ask him if he does not admit that these ships can be constructed more economically by private contract in private yards than in the navy-yards of the Government? I call his attention to the fact that in the Government yards the laborers work, I think, but eight hours a day, while in the private ship-yards they work ten, and it is universally admitted, I believe, that where labor is rendered to private individuals the men work more industriously, more vigorously, and the employer is more exacting than is the case where they are in the employment of the Government. I venture the opinion, without having any absolute particulars on the subject, that the ships can be built cheaper by at least 40 per cent. in private yards, assuming of course that the biddings are fair and bona fide. I say they can be built 40 per cent. cheaper in private yards than they can in the Government navy-yards.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, if the committee had brought us some evidence to that effect I should have accepted it with a great deal of satisfaction.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will pardon me again, I refer him to the testimony of Admiral Porter on that subject.

Mr. MORGAN. I read that yesterday in extenso to the Senate, and I do not think it establishes any proposition like that the Senator from South Carolina cites it for.

Mr. BUTLER. The Admiral said distinctly he had built one ship in a Government yard that cost $400,000, when it would have cost but about $200,000 in a private ship-yard.

Mr. MORGAN. Then the Admiral used the expression that he also lost forty pounds of flesh. It was an extravagant loss, one to which no naval officer will subject himself in these piping times of peace and these glorious days of cosy living.

Mr. BUTLER. Taking forty pounds off a naval officer is an extensive operation.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a great misfortune, I grant, and it is the worst injury I have heard of yet from the use of the navy-yards in building ships.

Now, sir, I take issue with the Senator from South Carolina on his proposition as to economy in two respects: First, as to the amount of money that will be expended in the building of a steel ship at the navy-yard in Washington, one that can be floated out of the Eastern Branch into the Potomac and down to the Chesapeake Bay. The United States Government, under our laws, as I observed yesterday, is not compelled to pay duty upon any material entering into the construction of a ship. The average duties upon that material are 45 per cent. ad valorem. Now, if you will give to Mr. John Roach, as you do by this bill really, the advantage of 45 per cent. ad valorem upon the cost of his materials in building ships—for he is not required to build them out of American material—he will make a very nice thing of it indeed. He will make at least 20 per cent. or 25 per cent. of profit upon his investment with that advantage in his favor; I mean profit upon that part of his investment which relates to the material that he uses, whether it is manufactured machinery or whether it is the crude material out of which the machinery is to be made. The Government of the United States is the only party in the United States of America to-day that can compete with Mr. Roach and Mr. Cramp and the other bidders, for the reason that it has got this advantage of 45 per cent. ad valorem upon this war material as it brings it in.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator permit me to ask him if that argument is not fallacious in this regard, that the increased cost of the material which Mr. Roach is obliged to pay beyond that which the Government is obliged to pay is the cost paid directly to the Government, so that the customs are in the Treasury? If the Government makes use of a material on which no customs duties are paid, it simply loses the amount which Mr. Roach pays to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I see the point in the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire, and I only wonder that he has deceived himself about that, for the fact is the Government has a right to bring in this material free for the building of these ships. That is the fact, about which there is no fallacy. It is very true that the Government collects revenue to go into the Treasury; but the Government of the United States is a personality, it is a corporation, it is an individual, when it concerns an act of this kind, the building of a ship or importing materials. It is an importer. As I remarked yesterday, it is a free-trader, and the only one in the United States. Being a free-trader, and having all the advantages of exoneration from customs duties on the materials which it imports, the Government as a personality does make the money, the 45 per cent. I grant you that that burden is distributed all over the whole country when the private ship-builder gets the advantage of the 45 per cent. duty; but I do not see any reason at all why the people of the State of Alabama should be taxed 45 per cent. ad valorem upon all the material entering into the construction of these steel ships when the Government of the United States under the law has the option to bring it in free. That is the point I make about it, and it seems to me there is no fallacy in that argument. The facts are too plain.

I was proceeding, though, to show, in answer to the position taken by the Senator from South Carolina, that I conceived that he was in error about the actual comparative cost of building a ship at the navy-yards and building a ship by private contract. It is said that the workmen in the navy-yards work only eight hours a day. Well, we can make it ten hours if we choose, I suppose, and get plenty of employés.

Now let us look at another item of cost that Mr. Roach and every other man who builds a ship must take into his account. Mr. Roach, I will take it for granted, has expended a sum equal to three or four million dollars in the plant with which he builds a ship. He must have interest upon that; he must have insurance upon it; he must have compensation for wear and tear; and those are among the heaviest items of expense in all calculations in respect of work like this. The Government of the United States has got not less than $8,000,000 in the navy-yard in this city; I do not know how much more, but not less than $8,000,000. It has got a large number of millions of dollars at Norfolk, at Boston, at League Island, at Mare Island, and at various places. Perhaps it does not keep the property insured, but it keeps a watch, an expensive guard under strict regulations, to prevent the loss of the establishments by fire, and if it were to pay an insurance bill that account would be very easily balanced up by the expenditures made annually for these guards and watchers to protect these yards. We lose the interest of all this enormous outlay, while we allow Mr. Roach to make it on his outlay. Where is the economy in that? We have got the plant; we have paid for it; we have got it insured and doubly insured at a very high expense; we are bound to keep it up or else let it rust and go to waste; so that we are expending largely for annual repairs of machinery that we seldom put in motion, that we do nothing at all with, but keep it there as an old curiosity-shop of mechanical implements which perform no work at all. Any man in this Chamber would be astounded to go into the navy-yard at Washington and see the very large amount of machinery in that yard of an expensive character that has not been turned round once in five years, not all obsolete machinery, but a great deal of it could be employed here in a useful way in naval construction and also in the manufacture of arms.

Having gone to this vast expenditure, and after having built in these very navy-yards the ships that now float upon the seas—all the Navy that we have got was built in them—we turn around and ignore them, and we say in a breath they are of no further use or utility at all; they must lie there dumb and dead, and never be used again in making ships; and then we go and authorize the Secretary of the Navy to take the machinery out of those very yards and loan it to John Roach or any other naval constructor for the purpose of building these ships, and then we pay to the private ship-builder 45 per cent. ad valorem duty upon the material, when our law says the material shall come in free, and that the Government of the United States shall have the advantage of it, by which is meant the people of the United States.

That is the category in which we are placed, and we are asked now to ignore, yes, more than that, to denounce the navy-yards as being places unfitted for the construction of ships of steel and iron, and that, too, without the slightest investigation by this committee or by the Secretary of the Navy to show us that this thing ought to be done. Why, sir, if a private citizen were to use his own property in such a reckless manner as this he would be locked up in a lunatic asylum, Saint Elizabeth's would infold him in its circling arms in less than four days after his neighbors got to understand the hallucination of the man in respect to the management of his own business. I have got a factory here for the construction of iron and steel implements—hoes, spades, mattocks, chains, and what not—in the city of Washington. I will say it cost me two or three million dollars. I wish to have a large amount of these implements made. I lock up my own establishment, put the work out to the lowest bidder who will make these for me, give him the benefit of a 45 per cent. ad valorem tax on the material and machinery he uses, to come out of my pocket, then loan him a part of the material at my establishment to make his chains, hoes, picks, &c. Would I not go to a lunatic asylum if my neighbors had any concern for me? No doubt. And yet we do that in the name of the Government and with the facts all staring us in the face, and we never stop even to inquire whether it is wise economy.

Why this is I do not know; but when we find men selected, only four bidding, and such preferences and such advantages and such bonuses as these given in the law and in the practice of the Government, there is room for inquiry, if not for suspicion, as to whether that contract can be a sound one in morals as well as in law. There is room at least for inquiry. It is time we had paused upon this matter and looked around us.

I called attention yesterday to the matter of the building of the monitor Merrimac at the Norfolk navy-yard. I will not repeat that story, and yet it is one of the most impressive in the history of naval warfare and naval construction. The genius of a people driven to their highest necessity by something that they could not possibly avoid built the Merrimac, clothed it with iron at least, and made of it a monitor of the greatest possible power. Thereupon came forth the monitors, not only from our own ship-yards but from the whole world; and now the great powers of the earth are looking upon each other from the decks of their armed ships, keeping the peace by the strength of the novel power which was put forth in that hour of confederate necessity.

There was another occasion when the bowels of the earth had to be opened and the ore dug out, the trees cut down, and the coal made, and the pig-iron run out and hauled a distance of sixty or seventy miles on a railway to the shores of the Alabama River—and my honorable friend from Kansas knows the story that I am about to relate, because he, I believe, among others has fallen heir to the property of which I speak.

Catesby Jones, a commander in the Confederate States navy—I believe he was formerly only an ensign in the United States Navy—was detailed to build at the city of Selma an ordnance foundery for the purpose of supplying seacoast guns, and also to assist in building certain rams and ironclads, one of which was the Selma, another the Alabama, and another, I believe, the Atlanta. Several were built there and launched at the city of Selma, which was one hundred and fifty miles by water from the bay of Mobile. The iron was made near there, the ships were built and launched, they went to the bay of Mobile, and there they fought Farragut, and fought him bravely and with splendid success, inflicting upon Admiral Farragut's fleet a very serious loss. In this navy-yard out here are guns that were captured on board that fleet. They were made without the use of a pound of coke or a pound of charcoal. They were made with pine wood, in a fifty-ton furnace; nothing used but pine wood. Those guns are in this navy-yard now, and they will probably bear the test, pound by pound, of explosives and missiles with any guns of iron made in any ordnance establishment in the United States to-day.

I speak of this now to show the ability of Americans in the production of whatever is necessary to be produced for their own defense and for whatever of aggression we may find consistent with our foreign policy. We have no need to stop and to consult other people or other nations about what they can supply us with in the form of guns, or the sheathing of vessels, or the armament of vessels, or the armor of vessels, or anything of that kind. We have the material, we have the ability, the skill, the enterprise, and surely we have the money, with $100,000,000 a year redundant revenue in our Treasury. Why should we longer hesitate to make use of these resources in building our navy and in arming our ships and seacoast defenses.

Now, I will suppose that the Government of the United States wants to engage in the manufacture of steel for these ships, as Mr. Roach makes his steel. They want to bring the fine ores, the non-phosphoretic ores, from Egypt and from Spain. They bring them in free. Can they not compete in their own manufactories with any other people in the world in the making of this metal? We can get the very best class of steel ore free of duty under the law as it stands to-day, and if the Government would establish a gun foundery and furnaces for the manufacture of steel under the advantages which she possesses under the rebate from this 45 per cent. ad valorem tax there is no limit to her capacity to produce all of the very best metal that is required for guns and for shot and shell and for the armor of ships and for the steel to make their hulls. Here we are now with all these advantages within our reach, and we persist in having steel ships built only by private contract, and those contracts limited to the competition of four men who have yards already equipped for the purpose of making these ships.

Sir, this policy is unjust to the people and to the country, and I wish that the Senator from Maine would incorporate into his bill, so that those of us who desire to have a navy can vote for his bill, some provision requiring the Secretary of the Navy to make estimates and examinations into these different yards, with a view to ascertain the respective economies between this building of ships upon the plan that those are being built which we have now under contract and building them at the navy-yards of our country. The people of the United States can not believe, with all your fleet of monitors and other descriptions of ships that are now upon the ocean, built by the Government of the United States in very large part, if not entirely, in the navy-yards, that we have in a moment lost the capacity or the ability to build these ships, or that the navy-yards where they were built have all of a sudden become entirely useless. They will not believe it.

While I am on this subject, Mr. President, to avoid the necessity of entering into this debate again, I wish to say something in reference to an amendment that I had the honor to offer, which is that hereafter no ship shall be sold or broken up unless the cost of repairing or rebuilding it would exceed 30 per cent. of its value when rebuilt or repaired. As the law now is it is 20 per cent. That was an experiment which we started upon a year ago. Under the provisions of that act we have broken up, or sold, or disposed of forty-eight ships. That has made a great chasm in the Navy of the United States, quite room enough for us to work upon for several years to come in the matter of filling it up. By the time we shall have got forty-eight ships, so as to bring the numbers back, of the class that we are proposing to build now, we shall have spent a good many millions of dollars and quite a long period of time. So I think it is time we had called a halt upon that 20 per cent. appraisement and rule of condemnation, and that we had really gone back to that sensible rule which was asked for a year ago by the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] when he said that the experience of the world indicated that the underwriters would not permit a ship to be abandoned to them unless the cost of repairing would exceed 33 per cent. of her value. That is to say, she must be two-thirds gone before they would consent to receive her under the law as a total wreck, as a ship that was deserving to be abandoned. That is a sensible rule and founded upon the experience of mankind. But by my amendment I propose to go from 20 to 30 per cent., and in doing so I wish to include that very considerable class of ships which should be retained, among the rest the Tennessee, which is the only first-class ship we have in our Navy, in order that she shall have the opportunity of riding the waves a little longer under the flag of some admiral, or at least under some flag.

Some of these ships, as was explained to us by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], would only be a fraction of a unit beyond the rate of condemnation, so curious and so nice was the calculation in respect to the cost required to rebuild ships or repair them to keep them efficient on the seas. Therefore I advocate a return to the 30 per cent. rule, and I hope the committee will have no objection to that, for there is no immediate necessity, to say the least now, for making this chasm larger only for the purpose of being filled up by the building of iron or steel ships.

That leads me to another statement that I desire to make of my views in respect of the necessity for a more efficient navy. We have a necessity for a navy and for a good number of ships. After a while we may find a necessity for armored ships; but none of those are proposed as yet to be built. The necessity for a navy is felt every day in a committee of which I have the honor to be a member, the Committee on Foreign Relations. There is no heroism of policy on the part of the United States Government founded upon our diplomatic or strategic ability, or upon our supposed control of commerce through our enormous productions, that will answer the purpose of giving to our Government its proper prestige among the foreign nations. I say foreign; I do not speak of Mexico and Canada. We must have something of that element which is a necessary part of every firm and strong power in the world before they will recognize our strength and our power and be properly careful of our rights as a nation.

I can state instance after instance before the Senate where the policy of the United States Government has been one of a hesitating and lame character because we were known not to possess the available power that a great fleet would give us. We may undertake to place ourselves in a reserved position as a great government and say we do not want to fight unless somebody comes here to fight us, nor do we need armies or navies to strengthen us. That is not precisely the attitude we should occupy; for to make a government respected, even in this nineteenth century and in the midst of the light and glory of Christianity and civilization, it is still necessary that it should be provided with the means of making its power felt as well among the Christian as the uncivilized nations.

A government is only half made up that has not a fleet, if it is a maritime power—that is some sort of an equivalent for its commerce and its population and its enterprise—only half made up. We can not afford to cheapen ourselves in this particular in the eyes of the nations of the world, for it is not the estimate we place upon ourselves that gives us strength abroad; it is the estimate that is placed upon us abroad that gives us strength there.

My attention was first called to the subject of the most necessary improvements in our Navy by that man whom I esteem to be one of the ablest, most patriotic, most experienced of men belonging to the Navy, a man who has reflected honor upon it in every position he has ever held—Rear-Admiral Rodgers. He is, as I understand it, the real author of what is called the corsair system, the system of ships that are most potent as commerce-destroyers. That is not a very agreeable view to take of the purposes for which a navy is to be organized, and yet it is a very necessary one. This is another instance in which the enterprise of the confederate government has been approved and its policy adopted by the great powers of the earth. In the particular of having ships prepared that can war upon the commerce of the great commercial powers they take the example of the Alabama and the Shenandoah, and they remember how desperately the commerce and power of the United States were wounded in the late war by the fact that these two cruisers were upon the high seas with heavy guns and powerful machinery.

Now, sir, if you have a cruiser like the Chicago and other cruisers of smaller tonnage upon the seas you will take bonds of the balance of the commercial world to keep the peace in respect to us and our commerce; and there is the great necessity and advantage of these vessels.

I asked the honorable Senator from South Carolina the other day, when we were discussing this question, whether a steel ship had any greater power of resistance against the shot and shell of an enemy than a wooden ship. He was of the opinion that it did not. There are many men in the Navy of the United States to-day who believe that the old Tennessee, with her thick walls, can whip any steel unarmored ship if you give her the same sort of guns. Then, in the building of these ships under this bill and under the bill which we passed last year, why are we building them of steel? Merely for the purpose of securing additional speed in the shape and lines which we are able to give to them and additional durability in the material of which they are composed. We are not building them for the purpose of defensive warfare against armored ships, nor for the purpose of defending our coast against the heavy ironclads that may come here to assail our cities, but merely for the sake of durability and for the advantages of speed and strength; so that they can go upon the wings of the wind, or rather they can go by the power of steam with immense rapidity, to all the accessible parts of the earth, and they can make that sort of threat against the commerce of the great commercial and maritime powers of the world which takes bond of them to keep the peace in respect to our commerce and all our affairs. This corsair fleet, though it may be a small one in each of the seas, will have more influence in keeping the other nations in due observance of our rights, authority, and power than though we had stationed about every harbor in the United States so many ironclads as would be able to drive off any fleet that might cross the Atlantic to assail our cities. It is the power of aggression to be always available that we gain by these ships which is measured abroad with careful attention and that gives dignity and influence to our policies as well as to our Navy. That is what I am trying to get, and that is why I want these steel ships, these fast sailers, these ships with splendid armaments, these gunboats which are by preference the best boats in the world according to naval experience for the purposes to which I have just been adverting.

One word more, Mr. President. Are we blind to the fact that within the next twenty years, to say the least of it, we shall have a ship transit across the Isthmus of Darien? What is that transit? A reformation of the oceans, a change in the physical geography of a hemisphere as it was mapped out and laid down by the hand of the Almighty Architect. It appears that we are to have nothing to say about that, nothing to do about it. Either in our impotence or our carelessness, our indifference, we are allowing these great changes in the seaboard and in the geography and in the relations of the seas to go unnoticed by us; but after a while, sir, we shall wake up at least to the necessity of having defensive power, if not offensive, to protect our commerce and our coasts in consequence of that change. We have now in the Pacific Ocean a commerce that is becoming very great, not merely with the countries on the opposite shores but also with the European countries, in ships doubling Cape Horn in order to get around to the Atlantic ports of commerce.

The traffic on the Pacific Ocean along this hemisphere ought to be almost exclusively within our control, but for the want of a navy we have neither the power to protect what commerce we have there, nor have we the power to protect our Government from threats and insults from even the powers on the South American continent. We would halt and hesitate about presenting any demands of our Government against the Government of Chili, because we would know that she could move along up the coast with perfect security with her armored vessels and cripple our commerce and burn San Francisco. We are not in the line of our duty when we neglect to consider these things. Our coast is threatened, embarrassed with foreign picket posts from Newfoundland, reaching around to the point of Yucatan. I have before had occasion to refer to this fact in the Senate and its important bearing upon our naval and seacoast defenses. Starting at Newfoundland, or Labrador, if you please, and going around our coast to the point of Yucatan, not one foot of any island is owned by us, and I think I am not incorrect in saying that we have not a naval station in all that circuit of great islands. We were informed, and it almost alarmed me the other day when the Senator from New Jersey said that the British Government had laid up at Halifax, the Bermudas, and other places of convenient storing, armaments and all manner of naval equipment for the fitting out of the lines of steamers that run from New York to Liverpool and elsewhere under her flag. France does the same thing; Germany does the same thing, and here is a military reserve of all manner of naval power stored up against us in these islands opposite to our coast, ready to be used against us at any moment.

Now, what is the disadvantage that we are under? It is this: They have got the interior lines upon us everywhere. You have got Portland, in Maine, to defend; you have got Galveston to defend and the mouth of the Rio Grande. You have got to pass around an immense circuit, including the capes of Florida, in order to get your ships from one point to another upon the coast, while the nation that assails you, whether it is Dutch or Spanish or French or British, can leave its naval stations on these islands where they have immense armaments and immense stores and sail into your ports before you can get to them yourself, and your fleets and your convoys and all have to pass with an exposed flank opposite to every one of these naval stations. Our coast is absolutely environed with foreign naval establishments, and yet we suppose that we have no necessity for more or better naval defenses and for more seaboard defenses. We could no more defend the mouth of the Mississippi River with our fleets against an attack from a Spanish armored fleet sailing from Porto Rico and Cuba and other adjacent islands than we could defend New Orleans against a cyclone. It would be upon us before we should know it, and they could destroy us before we had time to do anything in the way of assembling a fleet to meet them. That is our condition so far as we are prepared with a defensive navy to meet a sudden descent upon our coast.

What, then, do we need? We need a fleet in the Pacific Ocean. We need and are bound to have a fleet upon the lakes. We need a fleet upon the Atlantic. We need a fleet upon the Gulf. We need all these fleets to stand between our own coasts and the places of rendezvous which foreign nations have provided for their fleets. We have four vital points to defend, while these outlying islands give to foreign powers the choice of positions from which to assail us. Give us these fleets, sir, and we can rest in peace and enjoy our prosperity, and there will be none to make us afraid. Without these I know that I address myself to the anxious apprehensions of every man on this floor to-day when he looks at the condition of his country, and is bound to admit to himself that we are unprepared for great emergencies in naval warfare. In order to have fleets we must have yards in which to build them. My opinion is that the navy-yards are the proper places to begin. Use private enterprise in connection with them, but not to their discredit; but first of all and most of all we need in this country establishments for making our own guns, our own projectiles, our own ammunition. People like ourselves who are dependent upon foreign countries for the very guns with which to defend their coast and their cities are a people self-stultified and self-disgraced. The American mechanic, the genius of the American people, their enterprise and their wealth, all of them condemn a policy which is idle upon this question as being fatal to the welfare of this country.

I hope, Mr. President, that this amendment, in some form at least, will pass. The present law is not adequate. The Navy Department does not execute it; the navy-yards have no chance. Now, let us have a system which will put the Government of the United States right in this matter and which will compel the Secretary of the Navy to put one of these navy-yards in condition that we can build a steel ship just as well as a private citizen can build an iron or steel ship at Alexandria or at Chester.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, after what has been said here in debate with regard to the great abuse of power growing out of the repair of ships at the navy-yards, it will be remembered that all the ships which have been repaired of late years have been repaired at the navy-yards, not by private contract; and the Senator from New Jersey not now in his seat [Mr. MCPHERSON] produced some statistics which were very remarkable; which showed that there was very little economy, I think, in the repairing of those vessels at the yards where the repairs were done. The truth is, Mr. President, this has been a subject of universal complaint for years. Admiral Porter has said here in the interview or hearing before the Naval Committee that he had some work done at one of the navy-yards and it reduced him in flesh forty pounds. There must be something vicious somewhere in our system if all this be true, and I am not willing to accept the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] in the form in which he has presented it. I am not willing to give to any Secretary of the Navy—and when I speak of the Secretary of the Navy I am not speaking of any individual, my remarks are addressed to the official character, not to the person—I am not willing to give the power to any official at the head of the Navy Department to expend this sum of money in accordance with the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey at any navy-yard or navy-yards that he might designate, especially with the experience of the past before us, when the Admiral of the Navy comes up and tells the country and the Senate that from his experience in supervising the construction of a small vessel at one of our navy-yards he lost forty pounds of flesh in consequence of the political pressure brought upon him.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether I understood him correctly just now to oppose his own amendment?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Not my amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. You are opposed to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. In the form it is now; but I say if the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is to come in I want it improved. The Senator from Virginia can very well understand that principle of parliamentary proceeding that a Senator might be opposed to a bill in its existing form and might be willing to accept it if it were improved to suit him. I will vote, I say, for the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey if my amendment is adopted; I shall vote against it if it is not; and that opens up, I say very candidly to the Senate, a question which we ought to be prepared to meet, and put the navy-yards of the United States in a condition to do this work, as suggested by my friend from Alabama, for we know the opposite policy has been inaugurated. Commissions have gone out, and while the navy-yard in Virginia was designated as one of the yards to be retained, the only naval station in our great Mediterranean—and I say it with humiliation and somewhat of shame—was fixed upon for destruction.

In looking at the map it will be seen that from the Chesapeake to the mouth of the Rio Grande on that vast line of coast there was not a place where, in case of emergency, a ship could be repaired except at Pensacola. That yard was located there under the judgment of the best officers that were ever in the American Navy, and Admiral Farragut has left it on record that it was worth a war to retain it as a military and a naval post. When you come to look at its location, placed there not for the purpose of defending Florida, but for the purpose of defending the interests of our Mediterranean sea and the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico, where six millions of money have been already expended, I said that it was remarkable in view of the importance of that station and its history under all the governments that controlled that territory, English and Spanish, that it should have been designated for destruction, while the navy-yard in Virginia and one or two others on the Atlantic seaboard, where there was no use for them, were to be retained.

What would have been thought of France or of Spain if she gave up a naval station in the Mediterranean? But the policy has been begun. Hence I said in all candor yesterday to the friends of this new scheme of building a navy that it was not exactly the wisest thing to do to send out these roving commissions to get up reports for closing up navy-yards, reversing the entire policy of the Government all of a sudden in this way and bringing in the 20 per cent. provision. I would rather nothing of that kind had been done; still it would not prevent me from voting to increase the American Navy. I do not care where the ships are going to be constructed, for I am looking to the end, not to the means by which it shall be accomplished. I am free to admit that it will require the expenditure of money at any of these navy-yards to put them in a condition to construct these vessels, and if that is to be the policy, I want it equitably carried out, so that no one navy-yard shall have the entire advantage of this provision of law.

We have a navy-yard in the Gulf of Mexico, located there for years, one of the most beautiful locations in the world, near to coal and to iron, in the State of my distinguished friend near me, with timber in abundance, and I can say that it is one of the few navy-yards where ships have been built with profit to the Government. That day may have gone by. Two, I think, of the very best vessels ever constructed for the Navy, one of them still in commission, known as the Pensacola, was built in that yard, and I think it was built at a cost of construction less than it would have been had the work been done outside of the yard. But there has been nothing done there of late. Because in the summer-time a man or two dies from a little fever a great excitement is created against the place and against the region; a condition of things that never existed in former days. The place was sought after by the first officers of the Navy in former days; it was kept in a high state of efficiency previous to the late war; and so far as health is concerned it is far healthier than Havana, which is regarded as a vital point in a military point of view by the Spanish Government and by all Europe.

During the time the English Government had Florida no less a man than Edmund Burke put his finger on the map and designated the harbor and bay of Pensacola as of infinite importance to the government in a military and naval point of view that controlled the destinies of that great Gulf. Still these matters now have all dwindled down to little local considerations.

It was the view of Mr. Calhoun at, I think, the Memphis convention in 1843, that that point ought to be put above all others in a state of the highest efficiency to protect the commerce of that great gulf. That is a matter of history. The English never could have attacked New Orleans had there been a naval depot in the Gulf of Mexico and if she had not been able to make one of her West India islands a base of operations. The fleet that was sent forward by Great Britain in 1815 to attack the mouth of the Mississippi River made, as we know, Jamaica the base of operations against that southern coast, and but for that she never would have sent out the expedition at all.

These are purely naval and military matters, and now if we are going into this policy of constructing our ships at the navy-yards—because if this amendment of my friend from New Jersey means anything it means that—I want the navy-yard in our Mediterranean to stand upon a footing with the one on the Chesapeake and on the Delaware. That is the whole of it.

What I said in regard to the past practice of the Navy in the construction of ships I will not retract, although I am free to say that I should be glad to see things improved in that way, and it is possible they may be in the future. If this is to be the policy let us have it, but I am not willing to take the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey in the form in which he presented it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, the extraordinary position of the Senator from Florida induces me to say a few words. I shall vote for the amendment the Senator from Florida proposes. I am perfectly willing to vote for it. I can see nothing in it that is hurtful to anybody, though I can not see anything in it that is very beneficial to anybody. But the Senator says he will not vote for the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey unless we adopt his addition to it. It seems to me that opens up this whole question.

What are you going to do with these ships? If there be no necessity for them, why expend any money to build them at all? If this is the beginning and the end of an American navy, we had just as well stop right here. All have understood that this is the beginning of a policy of constructing an American navy that—if the Senator from Florida will permit me to make the statement—may some time or other fight out even the battle of personal and property rights for Irishmen on the shores of Canada. How would that Senator like a suggestion of that kind? If we are going to build these vessels and take them into the fresh waters of the James River, where iron or steel will not rust, then it is not necessary to make this expenditure.

I repeat that I understand this to be the beginning of the construction of an American navy. If it does not mean that, then I am deceived, and I would prefer to vote against the measure. If it does mean that, then I am for it, and I want to construct such a navy. The sense of the Senate has been taken on that question. It has been determined here that we ought to have a navy, and that seven ships shall be built within a certain stipulated time. The only other question then is how, or where, or by whom the vessels shall be constructed. One Senator on the other side objects that there will be a monopoly and that John Roach will get the contract. Gentlemen on this side and on the other side object to the construction of the ships at the navy-yards because they are not prepared to build them. The answer comes from one of the gentlemen in charge of the bill that $150,000 would perhaps prepare the Norfolk or some other navy-yard for their construction.

Mr. President, I wish to ask the attention of Senators to one proposition. Will the gentlemen who come in and bid for the building of these vessels not have to make the same provision to enlarge the capacity of their yards that the Government would have to do to prepare its navy-yards? If so, does not that enlarge the construction price or the bid? I will ask further why should we not have that expended on the navy-yards instead of having it counted in the bids of contractors for the construction of the vessels?

I have understood some Senators to say that there are but two competitors for the construction of these vessels. I have understood one Senator to say that there might possibly be four. I care not whether there be two or four; but in a country like this, where even a wheat crop can be "cornered," it is idle to tell me that four men can not "corner" on a proposition to build seven vessels.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator know that the competition for the building of the four ships provided for last year resulted in contracts covering everything needed in their construction, providing for their completion to the acceptance of the Secretary and the advisory board at a rate of cost as low per ton as the British naval administration is able to build its own ships with cheap steel? So far from there being any "corner" or any combination, there never was an instance that I know of of the magnitude of this where competition resulted in bringing down the price so satisfactorily. It would have cost the Government to do this same work that it gets done on one ship for $900,000, I venture to say, twelve or thirteen hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator has lost sight of what I started out with. I understand this to be a proposition to begin the building of a navy, and I am not going to stop to consider the difference in dollars and cents between the construction of a ship this year by a contractor or its construction at a navy-yard. I undertake to say that if we mean to construct a navy such as this Government ought to have, the way to begin is for the Government to build her own ships in her own navy-yards; and unless we mean that by this bill, we are building our vessels for nothing. We are at peace everywhere; we have no use for them.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Why does not Great Britain, which certainly stands at the head of the great naval powers of the world in her naval force, in the administration of human intelligence and skill, in the building of ships, build them in her own navy-yards? She never does.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am free to confess that Great Britain is not my model in anything, except perhaps in her common law; I accept that.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the Senator from Virginia one question in this connection? Perhaps I might better have asked it of the Senator from Maine. Is it not true that England builds in her own navy-yards the hulls of the ships for her navy and does all the work save and except the machinery?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am not prepared to answer. Perhaps the Senator from Maine can answer. I can not; I do not know.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am not aware that England ever gave a contract to build anything but machinery outside of her own navy-yards.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. This is the amendment exactly, providing for the purchase of the machinery of the manufacturers.

But I come back to the proposition that there has not been one reason advanced in the Senate why these ships should not be constructed at our navy-yards except that the navy-yards are sometimes used for political purposes. I suppose that means that sometimes the men who work in a navy-yard exercise the right to vote. I have known of men employed in a navy-yard coming out and howling me out of a speech from 8 to 12 o'clock at night; and yet that would not deter me from voting to construct these vessels in a navy-yard. I think the men there employed ought to have the right to vote. How else can there be any abuse there? You put men there to build these ships. They will vote. If you have them built out of the navy-yard, the men who work on them will vote.

On the other side, some gentlemen, as I have before said, object to letting the ships out to contract because there is not sufficient competition. I think that is a good reason why we ought to have the Government begin the construction of her own ships.

If the Senator from Maine can give me any other reason why we should not adopt the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], then I will cordially co-operate with him. I am for the construction of these vessels, for continuing the construction of vessels, for the continuance of a policy of constructing a great American navy, down to the last dollar in the United States Treasury, saving only that which is necessary to pay the interest upon our public obligations and for the support of the Government; but I do think that this is a matter which suggests itself to our good judgment; and I think further that Senators ought to consider whether the Government ought not to construct her own navy, and not leave everything of that sort to contract, when no Senator on this floor can assert that there are more than four private competitors at most on the whole continent.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The Senator from Virginia who has just taken his seat has manifested a very commendable spirit in favor of building up the Navy. I appreciate all that he has said in that direction; but although he intimated that I was not as fervent and possibly as sincere in that line as he was, I do not think that he did me full justice.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator will pardon me. I did not say as sincere, but not quite as earnest.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think I have given better evidence than even the Senator of my desire to build up a navy according to the usual tests. The bill before the Senate came from the Committee on Naval Affairs. It was the best thing we could do under existing circumstances to bring into existence such additional vessels as the exigencies of the public service require.

It is true that some provisions of law were enacted last session under which some vessels are now in the course of construction. When the Senator from New Jersey came forth with this proposition requiring the ships to be built at such navy-yard or navy-yards as the Secretary of the Navy might designate, I did not think that that amendment was in the line of promoting the end in view, because, after all that has been said here by my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], I do not know how he stands with respect to the present proposition, but I presume that the amendment of his colleague is acceptable to him. I thought that the bill from the committee as reported to the Senate was the best thing under existing circumstances that could be passed. I did not go into the details of it. I said in my place in the Senate yesterday that the policy was determined upon in Congress a year or two ago by the votes of gentlemen who are now antagonizing this bill. The Senate gave the Secretary of the Navy power that I refused at the last session to give to him, under which he is putting out of service our wooden ships day by day, and in a year or so the country will be without a single ship of war to carry its flag or maintain its honor. I showed by the RECORD yesterday that the Senators who are now foremost in their opposition to the present bill, which is intended to give authority to build ships to take the places of those they voted to retire, are not entirely consistent.

This bill has been reported from the committee. We considered it there. I gave it my support in the committee, and according to every rule of honorable action in parliamentary bodies I felt it to be my duty after it came to the consideration of the Senate to give it the support here that I gave it there. I did not want it complicated by any amendment. I wanted it to go through, and I wanted this effort in the direction of building up of a navy to be a success. That is the whole of it.

But yesterday evening the Senator from New Jersey on the other side of the Chamber [Mr. SEWELL] came forth with an amendment with respect to the navy-yards, and I said that the proposition in its form was a dangerous one, that it proposed to give the Secretary of the Navy a power even more dangerous in my opinion than the one conferred upon him last session under which the wooden ships are now being destroyed, and in that form I was not willing to accept it. Then I proposed an amendment to his amendment taking away from the Secretary of the Navy this discretion and requiring him to distribute the construction of these ships at designated yards, if the policy was to be carried out. I said very candidly to the Senator from Virginia that I would not vote for the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey in its present form, under which the Secretary would have the power of fixing up one or more localities within his discretion to do this work and make it a great engine of political power, if he was capable of doing that thing, rather than to distribute the construction of the ships between the various navy-yards in the United States, because power concentrated at one point can do more harm than when distributed among many localities. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] suggested in the debate yesterday that the Secretary of the Navy ought to have suspended the operation of the law of last session which commanded him to put out of existence our wooden ships. I now tell that Senator that the suspending power once claimed and exercised by English despots does not belong to American officials.

I am willing to accept the bill as it came from the committee and to vote for it in the Senate as I did in the committee. In that view, of course, I am acting in the line of building up the Navy according to my best judgment. I do not complain of those who differ from me on this subject, who think that nothing ought to be done. They must take the responsibility about that. I am discharging my duty as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs to the best of my ability with the lights before me. I think if we should determine upon the policy of building our ships at the navy-yards we will have to reverse the decisions of the board that has recently been organized to investigate them and make some liberal provisions for putting them in a state of complete efficiency. We have but one navy-yard at the South, leaving out Norfolk, and notwithstanding the millions that have been spent at other yards in repairing ships, not one vessel has been ordered to Pensacola for repair since the war ended.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will allow me to inquire whether any board has reported against the building of ships in the navy-yards?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No; but they have reported in favor of the abolition of nearly the whole of them.

Mr. MORGAN. That is a different board.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will say to the Senator that is not a board of my choice, I assure him, and its recommendations will never receive my approval.

Mr. MORGAN. But there is no report of any board against the building of ships in the navy-yards.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not say that there is. But there is plenty of evidence to show that these yards have been used for party purposes.

Mr. MORGAN. And yet the committee have not even inquired into the subject whether the ships could be built there.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If I was Secretary of the Navy and wanted to run the navy-yards for party ends I would accept the proposition of the Senator from Alabama, and construct these vessels at Norfolk and League Island.

There is a report of a board favoring the breaking up of nearly all the navy-yards except one or two to be held or retained for purposes of repairs. I will say candidly to the Senator from Alabama that I am against that policy. I understand that there is nothing in the existing law to prevent the President of the United States from constructing those vessels at the navy-yards if he thinks proper to do so, and I will say to the Senator that the method of constructing them, whether by contract or otherwise, has never entered my mind. All I looked to was that the people of this country should get the ships, and with respect to the details of their construction I am free to say to him I have given very little thought to that matter, and for this reason, that I supposed that the safeguards already provided were sufficient to secure the honest construction of the ships.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the Senator a question for information, if he will allow me. The Senator has been a long time a member of the Naval Committee, and very honorably, too.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. A minority member except for a very short time.

Mr. MORGAN. A minority member, and minorities usually are honored a great deal "in the breach if not in the observance." I wish to ask the Senator whether there is any other provision of law relating to the building of these proposed ships or those that have been built in navy-yards than the following proviso to the naval appropriation act of last year:

Provided, That he shall utilize the national navy-yards, with the machinery, tools, and appliances belonging to the Government there in use, in the building of said ships or any parts thereof, as fully and to as great an extent as the same can be done with advantage to the Government.

Is there any other law but that which applies to the building of vessels in the navy-yards?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am not aware of any.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs know of any other statute than that giving the power to the Secretary of the Navy to build ships in the navy-yards?

Mr. HALE. There is the general power. A navy-yard can be used, of course, for any Government purpose.

Mr. MORGAN. But I will remind the chairman that that is negatived, from the fact that the bill provides that the contract shall be let out to the lowest bidder.

Mr. HALE. That is, if the ships are built by contract. We do not prescribe how they shall be built. If they are built by contract, then these provisions and safeguards are thrown about them; but if the President, acting through the Secretary of the Navy, believes that they can be built in the navy-yards and can be built with advantage to the Government, these provisions become of no account.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not understand the law to be that way, for the reason that this measure, as well as the one which preceded it, prescribes the manner in which the ships shall be built; that is, by contract.

Mr. HALE. I beg the Senator's pardon; it does not. There is nowhere any law which directs that the ships shall be built by contract; it only provides, if they are built by contract, how the contract shall be made, with all the provisions about advertisement and notice and all the things that go to make it safe.

Mr. MORGAN. Still there is no provision in the bill, or elsewhere, providing that the necessary tools and machinery in the navy-yards shall be used in the building of any of these ships.

Mr. HALE. That would not be needed, anyway. If we should simply pass a bill for the construction of half a dozen ships, and leave it without any other provision whatever, the Secretary of the Navy would go to work and build them in the navy-yards undoubtedly.

Mr. MORGAN. What I was trying to do was to get at the exact state of the law. I have had some embarrassment because I have not been able to gather it from the statutes.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not know of any provision of law beyond that stated by the Senator from Alabama. I agree with the Senator from Maine that it must always rest with the discretion of the Government whether it shall build a ship at a navy-yard or not. I think that if an appropriation of public money were made in a general way for the construction of ships for the Navy, and there was nothing said as to the manner or mode of their construction, it would rest with the discretion of the Government to build them at its navy-yards or to let them out by private contract if it thought proper to do so. This is a discretion, of course, that ought to reside in all governments, as with individuals.

There has been a great deal of complaint as we know in regard to the expenditure of public money directly by the Government itself. At this very session my honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST], whom I do not now see in his seat very wisely, as I thought, introduced a bill which has been I think favorably acted upon by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, of which I am a member, providing for the erection of public buildings by private contract, and I think that that bill has the sanction of the chairman of the committee who I see near me at my right, because it was felt that the principle of it was proper, and that the vast public buildings that were going up all over the country were costing the United States millions of dollars beyond what they could be constructed for if let out by private contract.

I say with respect to this matter that it is entirely unimportant to me. I am willing to leave it to the Government; but when my friend from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], who I do not see in his seat at present, said that because of a little quibbling in regard to the mode of constructing the ships I could be regarded as hostile to the great end in view he mistakes my position very much. On the contrary, I want to brush aside all the cobwebs and little technicalities that stand in the way of accomplishing this great end.

We must have a navy. That is near to the American mind. We must have a navy very different from that which we have at present. Our ships do not conform to the changed state of naval architecture or the usages of war as now understood. Up to 1860, although our Navy was small, it was up to the full standard of any navy in the world at that time. The ships of the United States at that day and time were a credit to this Republic wherever they carried her flag. They did not have a ship in the British navy or in the French navy that was superior to our best vessels before the war. The great Democratic statesmen, if I may be pemitted to use a party expression, never lost sight for a moment of the importance of keeping the standard of our ships at least up to the best maritime and naval powers of Europe. But now we are in an utter state of degeneracy. We have got nothing except a few cruisers that would do for ordinary blockade purposes or to pursue an unarmed ship on the high seas in time of war and capture her. We have no ships with any fighting power, as everybody knows. Feeling this great necessity, as I have felt it for a long time, I availed myself of the first opportunity that I had of casting a vote in favor of putting the American Navy upon a footing commensurate with the importance, the interests, and the dignity of this great country.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator from Alabama will yield for a moment, I wish to make a motion regarding the order of business. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator from Rhode Island should withhold that motion until after we finish the bill. I certainly hope we shall not adjourn over unless we finish the bill to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We must finish the bill this week.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will accept the suggestion and withhold the motion for the present.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I would not say anything further about the amendment of the Senator from Florida if it were not that I in part represent one of the Gulf States, the nearest neighbor to Pensacola.

The amendment of the Senator from Florida requires that these ships shall be built in each of several navy-yards. Of course that would lead to an unnecessary expenditure of money. I suppose the object of the Senator was by his amendment to the amendment to kill it off. He evidently prefers that the ships shall be built by private contract and not in the navy-yards, for if he preferred that the ships should be built in any navy-yard he would allow the Government to select one or more, with reference to which we could make appropriations and provide the necessary tools and machinery so that the ships could be built there. We can not build a ship in every one of the navy-yards; we can not afford the expense of fitting up the navy-yards for the purpose, but if we have one yard in which we can build the ships then we have the United States in the market as a competitor, and we can have some chance of getting the prices down to a proper standard. That is as far as I desire to go.

Now, one word about the state of the law. It is left in great doubt. The bill itself as framed leaves the state of the law in very great doubt both as to the discretionary power of the President or the Secretary of the Navy as to whether the ships shall be built at the navy-yards or built by private contract, and also, I will add, as to the manner in which they shall be constructed. The bill itself refers to two acts of Congress preceding this, and adopts them as parts of this measure by requiring the ships to be built in conformity with the provisions of those laws. As I have observed, I am sorry the committee has not put those provisions into the act. I intend when we get into the Senate to move to strike out the amendment which was put in yesterday on the motion of the Senator from Maine with a view of having those provisions of law inserted in hæc verba in the bill.

Mr. HALE. In terms?

Mr. MORGAN. In terms.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that. I hope the Senator will prepare the amendment and have it ready.

Mr. MORGAN. I have it ready. Then I propose to add to it. I have been in doubt whether I should add what I will now read or whether I should propose it as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey when we reach it. The proposition as I will offer to amend in the Senate will read this way:

Provided, That he shall utilize—

That is to say, the Secretary of the Navy—

the national navy-yards, the machinery, tools, and appliances belonging to the Government of the United States there in use in the building of said ships or any parts thereof, as fully and to as great an extent as the same can be done with advantage to the Government.

That is the text of the law as it stands now. I would add to that the following:

And shall cause estimates to be made and submitted to Congress as to the economy of building said vessels at the navy-yards before any contract is made for building the same.

I am willing now to pass a law to build these ships, but I desire that the carrying of it into execution shall be delayed until the Secretary of the Navy can have his estimates made and submitted to Congress. They have not been submitted. I desire to see them. I believe that the result of them will be that we can economically build these ships in the navy-yards.

If the bill should pass early enough in the session those estimates can be submitted before Congress adjourns, and such action can be taken as Congress may deem advisable, either to stop the building of them under contract and carry them to the navy-yards, or allow them to be built, under the discretion of the President, under private contract; or suppose it should be delayed until December, still here stands the law, and further legislation will not be necessary unless that report shall make it necessary. You will have the provisions of the act under which you can go on to build the ships, and the time that will be lost between this and December would not be of any considerable importance compared with the loss of opportunity which this bill would force upon us to have these ships built in the navy-yards if it is found advisable to do so.

I firmly believe that if the committee had gone into the investigation of that question we should have the opportunity of building these ships in our own yards, and then we should have our yards in a condition where in time of war or in any time of emergency we would be prepared to go on and build our ships, without the necessity of having ship-yards built. The delay would not be very great. The delay would not affect the action of Congress; it would merely affect the time in which we would put the ships under construction.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not think that the Senator from Alabama is altogether warranted in saying that I have stated any preference in regard to the manner of the construction of these ships. My language of course speaks for itself, and he can draw what inference he pleases from it. I say I have never given a thought to the subject as to how the vessels shall be constructed.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very sorry the Senator has not done so.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not care; I have nobody to befriend in the matter one way or the other; I only want to give a decent and becoming discretion to those who have this great work in charge. Of course if I were to go into the subject of constructing the ships at the navy-yards, I might inquire where are your engineers and where are all your powers and abilities to begin this work. I am not going into that.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him what he means by discretion? The bill gives the largest discretion. The Senator's amendment narrows that discretion; it comes down to the places at which these ships shall be built. I do not understand that to be a discretion.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I can not ignore the fact that a year or so ago it was proclaimed from one end of this country to the other, and that, too, by the party to which I belong, that the vast sums of money referred to by my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] a while ago as expended in the repairs of ships were disbursed in the interests of a political party, and there is a column of figures there that almost baffles human calculation to look at showing the millions upon millions of money that have been squandered by those navy-yards in the repair of ships, and in many cases, as it has been said, the money was used to build up the fortunes of a political party. That charge has been made from one end of this country to the other. Whether it is true or not is another question, but I have heard it stated, if I am permitted to use private information, that some of the repairs that have been made in the Government yards cost three times what the work could have been done for if it had been let out to contract. I do not know how true that is, but this is one of the questions with which we are confronted. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEW-

ELL] proposes to go back to that system and to give the Secretary of the Navy power to take his $4,000,000 and expend it at any one or two navy-yards in his discretion after the methods of the past. What do the gentlemen who have indicated by their speeches and their votes here distrust with respect to the naval management say to this proposition? If there is any danger from this expenditure of money to the integrity of political parties or the fairness of elections, is it not better that the power of the Government over it should be as restricted as possible?

I understood that the main objection to the bill was (and we may just as well speak candidly) that it was going to place in the hands of those in power a fund that could be expended in a way that would hurt or benefit this or that political party. I am sure that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] does not improve that situation, if that be the objection. It will place the entire $4,000,000 in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy absolutely, to be expended by his employés under a system which brought down the flesh of an admiral forty pounds, according to his own statement, and that almost put him in the condition of a skeleton when he had in charge the repair or building up of one little vessel in the navy-yard at Washington.

It is a choice with us between evils. We can not have anything absolutely perfect in life, but surely there has been nothing of late years in the administration of the navy-yards and the repair of ships there to commend them to public favor. The purpose of my amendment is to take away this absolute discretion, which might be rendered more dangerous. If we are going into this system, I want to go into it as it was in the far-off past.

I will say to the Senator from Alabama that in previous days when vessels were provided to be built it was not unusual to apportion their construction among the several navy-yards after the manner pointed out and indicated by my amendment. The two ships that were built in the navy-yard at my own home, the Pensacola and the Seminole, were built, I think, under a resolution of Congress in 1858. At that time Congress provided for the construction of quite a number of ships, and they apportioned their construction among the navy-yards according to their capacity to do the work, and two of them were assigned to the Pensacola yard.

Mr. PIKE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. PIKE. Why does he not include the navy-yard in New Hampshire as well as the one in his own State in his amendment?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I did not know that we were to have ships enough to go around, and I did not want to leave my own State out. [Laughter.]

Mr. PIKE. The Senator looked after his own State.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. There were but seven ships to be built, and I thought I would put them around as well as I could without leaving out my own State.

If we are to go back to this policy, then let us put all the navy-yards upon a decent footing so that this work can be done in them. I say candidly that this question did not present itself to my mind, and I was willing to leave some discretion in accordance with the laws now in existence in order to carry out the great purpose of constructing a navy. The thing foremost in my mind was to get a navy. I do not believe that the Government of the United States, either by private contract or by doing the work itself, can ever succeed in doing work as cheaply as an individual. I do not know that any government can; but I am sure that the experience of the past tells us that there is nothing in the system suggested by the amendment of my friend from New Jersey to give it special confidence and favor at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. MORGAN. I propose to amend the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey by inserting in line 3, after the word "Government," the words:

If it shall be so directed by the President.

So as to make that part of the amendment read:

That the vessels authorized by this act shall be constructed at one or more of the most suitable navy-yards of the Government, if it shall be so directed by the President, under the supervision of the proper officers of the Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. MORGAN. My object in putting that amendment into the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is to have the law definitely settled that the President may direct that these ships shall be built in the navy-yards. If that is the law now, as the Senator from Maine I understand contends that it is, it is left in some doubt. The additional merit of the amendment would be that it provides the necessary tools and machinery for the navy-yard that might be selected. It makes provision for those things in order that the ships may be built. It is idle for the President of the United States to make the selection now that they shall be built in the navy-yards unless we in some way supply to the navy-yards the tools and machinery necessary for building the ships. I would be content, so far as I am personally concerned, with that direction, because we should then have the responsibility thrown upon the President of the United States to determine in the manner that he might think best whether it was better to build the ships, or some of them, in the navy-yards, or to build them under private contract; and the people of the United States ought at least to have the advantage of his judgment upon that proposition.

Mr. HALE. I see that what the Senator seeks is to make the law certain. Why not then, as it seems not to accord precisely with it, strike out all of the proviso and let it read:

That the vessels authorized by this act shall be constructed at one or more of the most suitable navy-yards of the Government: Provided, The President shall so direct.

Striking out the last part entirely.

Mr. MORGAN. Then we should have no means provided by which our yards could be put in a condition to build the ships. The rest of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey provides the means by which tools and machinery may be obtained at the navy-yards the President might select for building the ships.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not understand that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey after the word "provided" in any way touches the fitting up of navy-yards?

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator be good enough to read it? I have not got it before me.

Mr. HALE. It only provides for contracting for machinery for the ships outside of navy-yards. If the Senator will read the amendment carefully, he will see that it is not in the direction that he is seeking to go. It relates to another matter. Let me read the proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may be authorized by the President to procure the machinery for said vessels from parties engaged in the business of constructing naval machinery, the lowest responsible bidder to be accepted, after three months' advertisement, &c.

It is a direction to procure the machinery from outside parties.

Mr. MORGAN. I see that I was in error.

Mr. HALE. It is not needed at all in view of what the Senator is seeking to do.

Mr. MORGAN. I misconstrued the amendment to that extent.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to striking out the proviso and putting in the words the Senator suggests.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall not offer the amendment to the amendment under those conditions. I propose when we get into the Senate to offer an amendment that I think will have a better effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Alabama to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. HALE. How does the amendment stand now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No amendment to the amendment has been adopted. It is the amendment as proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. HALE. I hope that will be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon that amendment the Chair is informed that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. Let it be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. That the vessels authorized by this act shall be constructed at one or more of the most suitable navy-yards of the Government, under the supervision of the proper officers of the Navy: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may be authorized by the President to procure the machinery for said vessels from parties engaged in the business of constructing naval machinery, the lowest responsible bidder to be accepted, after three months' advertisement in the principal newspapers of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and San Francisco, payments to be made as the work progresses; but at no time shall it amount to within 25 per cent. of the value of the work and material, which amount of the contract price shall be retained by the Secretary of the Navy until final completion and acceptance of the contract.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is coercive. It does not leave any discretion at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

Mr. JACKSON (when Mr. KENNA's name was called). The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] requested me to announce his pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY]. If he were here, I should vote "nay." I am paired, I may state, for the remainder of the afternoon on this bill.

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. MITCHELL's name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] is detained from the Senate by sickness. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. GARLAND (when Mr. WALKER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WALKER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COKE. I was requested by my colleague [Mr. MAXEY], who was in the Senate Chamber up to a few moments ago, to say that he is paired on all these questions with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. COCKRELL. I was paired yesterday with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. I do not see him in his seat to-day, and I will withhold my vote. He has not voted, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; he is detained at his home by sickness.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understood yesterday that he was detained by sickness, and as I have been paired with him for a day or two, I shall continue the pair.

Mr. HALE. My colleague [Mr. FRYE] is absent by order of the Senate, and is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

The result was announced—yeas 2, nays 47; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to add as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. —. That no vessel of the United States Navy shall hereafter be broken up or sold, the repairs or rebuilding of which will cost less than 30 per cent. of the appraised value of such vessel, under the existing laws regulating the appraisal and condemnation of such vessels.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. Shall the vote be taken on all the amendments together?

Mr. HARRIS. In gross, I suggest, if there be no separate vote asked on any particular amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless some Senator desires to reserve the vote on a particular amendment the question will be on concurring in all the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to reserve the amendment offered yesterday by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] for the purpose of offering an amendment in lieu thereof, to strike out and insert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama desires to have the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole on the motion of the Senator from Maine reserved for a separate vote. The question is on concurring in the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment reserved.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the reserved amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That said vessels, rams, and boats shall be designed and constructed in all respects in accordance with and subject to the conditions and provisions of the naval appropriation acts of August 5, 1882, and March 3, 1883, authorizing the construction of four steel cruisers.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to strike out that amendment and insert in lieu thereof—remarking before I send it to the desk that I have had the statutes copied literally so far as I understand them to apply to this question, and thereby covering precisely the ground that the Senator from Maine covered in his amendment, except that I put the texts of the former laws into the text of this proposed law; but in doing so I have made certain changes to which I will call the attention of the Senate after the amendment has been reported at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves to amend the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 3 and to insert in lieu thereof:

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the advisory board appointed in conformity with an act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, approved August 5, 1882, to advise and assist the Secretary of the Navy, in his office or elsewhere, in all matters referred to them by him relative to the designs, models, plans, specifications, and contracts for said vessels in all their parts, and relative to the materials to be used therein and to the construction thereof, and especially relative to the harmonious adjustment, respectively, of their hulls, machinery, and armament; and they shall examine all materials to be used in said vessels, and inspect the work on the same as it progresses, and have general supervision thereof, under the direction of said Secretary. But said board shall have no power to make or enter into any contract, nor to direct or control any officer of the Navy, the chief of any bureau of the Navy, or any contractor. Neither of the vessels hereby authorized to be built shall be contracted for or commenced until full and complete detail drawings and specifications thereof, in all its parts, including the hull, engines, and boilers, shall have been provided or adopted by the Navy Department, and shall have been approved, in writing, by said board, or by a majority of the members thereof, and by the Secretary of the Navy; and after said drawings and specifications have been provided, adopted, and approved as aforesaid, and the work has been commenced or a contract made for it, they shall not be changed in any respect, when the cost of such change shall in the construction exceed $500, except upon the approval of said board, or a majority of the members thereof, in writing, and upon the written order of the Secretary of the Navy; and, if changes are thus made, the actual cost thereof and the damage caused thereby shall be ascertained, estimated, and determined by said board; and in any contract made pursuant to this act it shall be provided in the terms thereof that the contractor shall be bound by the determination of said board, or a majority thereof, as to the amount of the increased or diminished compensation said contractor shall be entitled to receive, if any, in consequence of such change or changes. And for the construction of all which vessels and their armament the Secretary of the Navy shall invite proposals from all American ship-builders and builders of machinery whose ship-yards are fully equipped, or shall within six months from the date of the contract be fully equipped, for building or repairing iron and steel steamships, and constructors of marine engines, machinery, and boilers. And the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to construct said vessels and procure their armament at a total cost for each not exceeding the amounts estimated by the naval advisory board in said report; and in the event that such vessels, or any of them, shall be built by contract, such building shall be under contract with the lowest and best responsible bidder or bidders, made after at least sixty days' advertisement, published in five of the leading newspapers of the United States, inviting proposals for constructing said vessels, subject to all such rules, regulations, superintendence, and provisions as to bonds and security for the due completion of the work as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe; and no such vessel shall be accepted unless completed in strict conformity with the contract, with the advice and assistance of the naval advisory board, and in all respects in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 5, 1882, except as they are hereby modified. And the authority to construct the same shall take effect at once; and the Secretary of the Navy may, in addition to the appropriation hereby made, apply to the constructing and finishing of the vessels in this clause referred to any balance of the appropriation made to the Bureau of Construction and Repair and Steam-Engineering for the current fiscal year, or in the present act, which may remain available for that purpose: Provided, That he shall utilize the national navy-yards, with the machinery, tools, and appliances belonging to the Government there in use, in the building of said ships, or any parts thereof, as fully and to as great an extent as the same can be done with advantage to the Government, and shall cause estimates to be made and submitted to Congress as to the economy of building said vessels at the navy-yards before any contract is made for building the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the amendment agreed upon as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORGAN. There are two changes here made in the text of the present law to which I call attention. The first relates to the condition in which the contractors' ship-yards shall be at the time they take these contracts. The law as it stands now requires that they shall be in a thorough state of equipment, prepared to make the hulls of steel ships at the time they take the contract. My amendment extends that time to six months after the contract, of course under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe. He can of course prevent a failure of the contract by requiring bonded security, if he chooses, that the contractor will put his ship-yard in proper condition to execute the contract within six months. The party desiring to take the contract for building these ships having the proper capital and having a ship-yard in all respects suited to it might not undertake to put his yard in that condition until after he had secured the contract which he was willing to make and which the Government was willing to accept. Thereupon within six months from that time, as the act is proposed to be amended by me, he would procure the necessary additional machinery and tools and implements to execute his contract.

The object of this amendment is to enlarge the area of competition. It is to bring into competition for the building of these ships not merely those who may have by anticipation prepared their ship-yards for the purpose, but those who might be willing to go on and make the preparation.

To illustrate the point of my amendment, Mr. Roach, I will say, is building all these ships now. I believe it is understood he has the contract for all.

Mr. BUTLER. We can not hear what the Senator is saying.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama will suspend. Senators will please cease conversation; Senators are unable to hear the Senator who is addressing the Chair.

Mr. MORGAN. I believe it is conceded that Mr. Roach has the contract now for building all the ships that are under contract. Of course he has prepared himself with all the necessary machinery and tools, doubtless at considerable expense; but it is so that perhaps he is the only man in the United States who is in condition to comply with the terms of the statute as it stands and as the committee propose to re-enact it. That is not fair to the rest of the people of the United States who may want to engage in ship-building nor is it fair to the Government itself. When we virtually confine the building of ships to private contract, and we find but one man who is in condition to take the contract, I would say that we are very much at his mercy as to the prices we shall pay him if we are to have a navy at all and have these ships built at all.

Why not say, as I propose in the text of this act, that a person shall have his bid accepted who will engage with the Government that he will be prepared within six months from the date of the contract with a ship-yard fully equipped to go on with the work? Then we shall have some chance for competition. But I respectfully submit to the Senate that by the iron rule prepared by the committee in their bill we have no option in this matter. What has been said about possible favoritism or fraud, whether it is actually true or not, leaves the motives of Congress open to inquiry and suspicion with respect to the desire and purpose to have but one gentleman engaged in building ships. We put ourselves in the category that we have no chance for reasonable contracts at all, and I wish to introduce something into this bill that will at least give us some chance for competition.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understood the Senator to advocate the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey in his remarks and I understood him a while ago to vote against it.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator is mistaken about that. I did not advocate the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Does this amendment embrace the same thing? I ask whether it leaves the option to build the vessels by contract or in the navy-yards?

Mr. MORGAN. The amendment I am now speaking of does not touch that subject. There is another amendment I propose after I get this text of the existing law incorporated in the bill which I think will touch that. What I advocated in respect of the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey was the principle that at least one navy-yard of the United States should be fitted up with a view to building ships, and that we should always keep it fitted up, so that the Government would in that respect at least be in competition with private bidders in the building of ships.

That was as far as I went; and I misunderstood, as the Senator will remember, the purport of the concluding part of the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey. In fact I had not studied that; I had only looked at it very casually. I suppose that the concluding portion of the proviso in the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey referred not to the navy-yards, but to the machinery and tools necessary to do the work, whereas I found that it only related to the obtaining of machinery for the ships themselves—a different matter. I was mistaken in the purport of the amendment as far as that was concerned.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The mistake I made was in speaking to something that was not before the Senate. I thought the Senator was speaking to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey. That was my mistake.

Mr. MORGAN. It is very customary, as the Senator will learn after he has been here a while, that a Senator will speak to a great deal that is not before the Senate. There is no harm in that in the Senate of the United States. I am gratified at that, because I do not like myself always to be confined to any text in my remarks, as if arguing a plea before a court.

But my amendment, Mr. President, at present only provides an opportunity for those American ship-builders to compete in these contracts who may after six months from the date of the contract provide ship-yards of a sufficient capacity and with the necessary equipment to carry these contracts into effect.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have only one word to say. I do not think I need to show how utterly impracticable this scheme would be as presented by the Senator from Alabama, that the Secretary should put out proposals and make contracts with any party who would agree that in six months from the time of making the contract he would have his yard ready to go to work. In the first place, that postpones everything six months, which I do not believe the Senate wants to do. In the next place, it throws the whole matter into the most chaotic and confused form possible; for what would happen if the Secretary made a contract with a man who at the end of six months failed to put his yard in condition? He is dealing with all the probabilities or possibilities of the future, and I can not conceive anything ingeniously devised that would render him so helpless and hopeless in the task of constructing these ships as this amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama. I do not know when any thing would be done under the amendment, certainly not under six months; and if a man failed in what he agreed to do for the future, then it is all thrown open again, and a year is lost. I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. When we make a contract for the building of the ship itself we must have some better guarantees of the performance of that contract than the mere state of preparation the contractor may be in at the time for carrying on the work, for he might fail of having money enough to build the ship after all, and that would throw things into chaotic confusion, as the Senator from Maine says.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator's amendment do more than put it within the power of the President to exercise the discretion of contracting with such a person?

Mr. MORGAN. Not any more than that.

Mr. HALE. But the lowest bidder may be a man who has no yard, no plant, who has no means of carrying out his work, but agrees that he will have it six months ahead, whose bid might supplant all the regular builders, men who are already prepared. Of course it puts it off six months.

Mr. MORGAN. The Secretary of the Navy has the right to establish rules and regulations under which these bids shall be made; and that is a broad power given in all such statutes, conferring on him a discretion which executive officers are not at all slow to avail themselves of, and which are entirely effectual when they are availed of. This discretionary power enables him to reject a bid if it does not suit him, although it may be the lowest bid.

Mr. HALE. Clearly not.

Mr. MORGAN. If a bid was made, by myself for instance, to build a steamship worth a million and a half of dollars, when I had no ship-yard, no skill in construction, no money to build it with, who would contend that the Secretary of the Navy, because I might put in a bid for a million dollars for a ship worth a million and a half, would be compelled to accept it when he has discretionary power?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly as at present; but suppose in just that situation the Senator should come in and make a bid and agree that in six months he would have a yard in order, the Secretary must take that bid.

Mr. MORGAN. I must secure my agreement to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy and show him that in six months' time I will be able to do it; and he has power to accept the proposal on that condition if he wishes. Otherwise the committee have left us in very bad shape by putting us under a law by which we are compelled to accept the lowest bidder for the ship without regard to who makes the bid. I trust the committee have not forced us into that corner. I should dislike to occupy it at the command of the committee even. The law is entitled to and will receive a very different interpretation from that. The power which exists to make proper rules and regulations for carrying this law into effect necessarily implies the authority on the part of the Secretary to reject any bid, however formal it may be in its character and however it may conform to the precise letter of the statute, unless that bid in fact corresponds to its spirit and intent; that is, to secure the building of the ship. As we have it, though, I submit to the Senate and I submit to the country through the Senate that the bill as presented by the Committee on Naval Affairs is a bill to confine the building of these ships to John Roach's ship-yard. I have been trying to avoid landing on that rock, because I want the Navy built; but if the Senate of the United States or the Secretary of the Navy have a special purpose in view to put the building of these ships into the hands of one single man, he being the only man that is prepared to do it, I can not follow in that direction.

Mr. HALE. Why does the Senator say and continue to iterate and reiterate that John Roach is the only man in the country prepared to build these ships when I have shown here this morning—the Senator has taken the book and read it himself—that in the contracting for the vessels now building four well-known, competent, well-established concerns, as ready as John Roach, entered into the field and made bids? Now why continually after that declare that there is any purpose or object here in putting these ships into the hands of any one contractor? Nobody desires that. The Senator ought not to consider that the committee reporting this bill has any purpose of that kind in view.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know what anybody desires, but I know that it is my duty as a legislator, if anybody should desire a thing of that sort, to prevent it, if I can do so by the use of proper words in the bill. I do not know and the Senator from Maine does not know whether the other three persons who bid heretofore a year ago for the building of ships are now prepared with yards equipped for the purpose.

Mr. HALE. I know that they are prepared; they are large concerns.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator has not put it in his report; the committee have not investigated it. I am prepared to say that I do not think the Senator has acccurate information on this subject. The presumption would be that, having failed to get the contract heretofore for building any ships at all, one man having gotten all the contracts, he is in a state of preparation to build the new issues of ships, whereas the other men excluded from the contracts because of the amount of their bids heretofore have not kept themselves in preparation to build these ships, and under the provisions of this bill I do not know but that these ships can be put out under contract within a few weeks' time.

The Senator has complained of delay about it. Let me say to him, beware of too much haste. While we need a navy, we are not suffering for it. We can afford to be a little deliberate about this; very much better afford to take a little time to scrutinize everything than we can to hasten the building of these ships; for the impulse which leads us to hasten this work may lead us into having these contracts pushed upon the market right away, when other men will have no opportunity even to be prepared to take these contracts. If I occupied the position of John Roach to-day, with his command of money and machinery and influence, I do not know that I could have any greater subject of felicitation than the passage of this bill as the committee reported it, for I would understand perfectly that, being prepared with a ship-yard and all necessary material and machinery, and being presumptively, and I have no doubt in fact, the only man who is prepared when you offered your contracts, I should have the control of the market, and I could take these ships at pretty much any price I pleased. Haste will throw us into his hands in spite of all we can do. Deliberation, caution, and care may enable us to have these ships built by some other American who is willing to build them cheaper than Mr. Roach.

I do not speak from the standpoint of a man who has prejudice or who is embittered toward Mr. Roach or Mr. anybody else. I merely recognize the undeniable fact that so far as we are informed by this committee or so far as any gentleman on this floor knows of his personal observation Mr. Roach is the only man in the United States who is now prepared to build these ships, and he will be the only man in the United States who will be prepared to build these ships on the day that these contracts are to be let, and we might just as well put him in the bill and name John Roach as the man to build the ships at his own price as to pass this bill in the language in which it is now, under the circumstances by which this case is surrounded. I want a navy, but do not expect that any House, this or the other, will pass a bill open to such serious question and criticism as this must be when the committee are perfectly unyielding in their demand not merely that these ships shall be built but built now, not only built but built by John Roach; for that is the effect of it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think the Senator is entirely warranted in that statement.

Mr. MORGAN. It is not a statement, it is an argument.

Mr. BUTLER. It is an argument, I suppose. I am sure that my friend from Alabama will on reflection not repeat that statement, although he says it is in the form of argument. It seems to me that the Committee on Naval Affairs took every possible precaution that ordinary foresight could adopt to get the very information that the Senator from Alabama says we have not produced. I will refer him (if he will turn to page 92 of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs) to the testimony of Admiral Porter in reply to a question which I put to him. I will read the question and his reply:

Senator BUTLER. With our present facilities for building ships in this country, how long would it take to get a navy of the size you have just indicated?

Admiral PORTER. It depends altogether on the application of the amount of labor to the work. You go to work and employ the great ship-yards of this country, Cramp in Philadelphia, Harlan and Hollingsworth in Wilmington, John Roach in Chester, and some in the Eastern States and in New York and Boston, and you can soon do it.

That is a statement of fact made by Admiral Porter, the Admiral of the Navy—I take it not made loosely. I assume that the Admiral knew what he was talking about when he referred us to a number of large ship-yards in this country where these ships could be built. I submit to the Senator that the statement that this bill would put the construction of these ships in the hands of John Roach, and John Roach alone, is not warranted by the facts. I submit that to him now in all candor.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know whether it would or not. I am arguing from a state of facts which seems to be conceded, and I am arguing further from the fact that this honorable committee have not furnished us with the facts that it ought to have done in order to enable us to vote in an enlightened way on this question.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I should like to ask the Senator what facts he wants?

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to have had you ask Admiral Porter, "Are these ship-builders prepared with every arrangement required by the act of Congress now for the building of steel ships?"

Mr. BUTLER. Why, Mr. President, I am sure the Senator would not have asked me to propose a question of that kind to the Admiral of the Navy, who had just stated in reply to my question that they were in a condition to build these ships. I did not ask the Admiral, I would not insult him by asking him, if they had every single tool, every appliance, every plant necessary to build every part of a ship; but I assume that he knew what he was talking about. I was not familiar with the subject.

Mr. MORGAN. If they are not in that state of preparation required by the law to become contractors or builders under this bill, then they have no right to bid, and so far as we know and so far as this committee has informed us but one man to-day in the United States has got a right to bid, and that is the man who is constructing the ships now.

I am not here either to accuse the committee or to excuse it for not having presented this case in a proper light before the Senate. I am acting in the absence of information. I am compelled to surmise and to argue and to reason in order to come to a conclusion, and in arriving at a legislative conclusion where my vote is the expression of my conscientious conviction upon my oath I have a right to know something about the facts of this case, and the committee had the duty resting upon them to inform me.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. As a matter of fact I will contribute the testimony of my own personal knowledge that there are four other iron-ship building establishments on the river Delaware within a radius of thirty miles of Mr. Roach's yard that can build as large, as strong, as swift, and as valuable vessels as his or any other ship-building establishment anywhere else. The firm of Cramp & Son is one; the American Ship-Building Company, of which Captain Gorringe is the president, is the next; the firm of Pusey, Jones & Co. is the third; and the Harlan & Hollingsworth Company make four; and they or any of them can build just as good vessels as Mr. Roach, and they can build as good vessels as anybody else in this world if they get the order to do it.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. President, we are beginning to understand the subject. Here a Senator gets up and states in his place facts that I accept as being undeniable. If the committee had seen proper to put those facts in the record this debate on this proposition would not have sprung up in the form that it has. We now are informed of four establishments in the United States that can build iron or steel ships, only four. Those are not all the ship-yards in the United States. There ought to be forty perhaps—I do not know how many, but quite a number—and these all ought to be admitted to competition. If a man wants to bid for work to be done in his ship-yard, and he is not at the time in a state of preparation to do it, but gets his bid accepted and can then go on within six months' time and prepare himself to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy to do the work, how can we refuse to allow that man to come in and compete?

I contend that the Government of the United States ought to be a competitor also, and the latter clause of the amendment which I have sent to the desk provides for that by allowing the President of the United States to take information and to direct that these ships shall be built in a navy-yard, in the event that he becomes satisfied after an examination that that is the most economical and the best way to do it. He shall direct it. That is the closing part of the amendment which I have had the honor to offer. But the present point is that I wish to strike out that feature in the existing law which requires that the contractors shall be in a state of preparation at the moment they bid. How long are these biddings to be open? The law says after such a length of advertisement. You can put your advertisement in the moment this bill is signed, and you have a very brief time then in which to make preparation, and that confines it, according to the testimony as we have it here before the Senate through the Senator from Delaware, to four or five persons at the outside who can bid; and there ought to be more.

Mr. BUTLER. I am entirely in sympathy with the Senator from Alabama in throwing every possible safeguard around this bill that can be thrown around it reasonably; but I now submit to him whether in his experience either as a Senator or as a man he has ever known a proposition similar to that which he has just submitted to the Senate? I ask him whether in the erection or construction of a public building, in putting in bids for supplies for the Army and Navy, in the Quartermaster's, the Commissary, or the Ordnance Department, or in any other Department of the Government, he has ever known that prerequisite to be required of a man who bids, that he must put himself in a condition, and allow him six months to do it, before he will comply with the terms of his contract? I submit that to him as a matter of business.

Mr. MORGAN. I never knew a contract to be made by the Commissary Department for bacon and molasses or vinegar or flour, or by the Quartermaster's Department for clothing, shoes, or goods of any description, which provided that the man should have any particular machine on hand or a factory for making it before he should be allowed to bid; I have never known anything of that sort. This case stands on peculiar grounds; it is entirely sui generis, for the reason that Congress in its wisdom has seen fit to ordain heretofore that the party who shall be allowed to bid must first place himself in a particular attitude to show that he is ready and prepared to execute the contract; he must be prepared at the time that the contract is entered into; if he is not prepared he can not bid, and that must confine the bidding to a very few persons.

What I propose to do is merely this, not to dispense with the necessity of his being prepared to execute the contract, but to give him some little time after the contract or engagement is entered into within which he shall put himself in a state of preparation, in order not that only four men shall come in and compete in the biddings, but in order that more capital which might find itself profitably invested in such an enterprise as this may be furnished.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I do not want the Senator from Alabama or any Senator to feel that the Committee on Naval Affairs is unyielding about anything of this kind or has any desire to favor any one man. Anything that will not unduly delay this enterprise that the Senator wants to see set on foot as much as I do, I take it, I am willing to consent to, but the Senator will see that in the form that his amendment now is placed it involves six months' additional time after the bill passes. The bill is not going to pass to-day; it can not probably get through the House of Representatives, if at all, under two or three months. Then six months after the contract is made are to be allowed; this may carry it around for more than a year and thereby destroy a whole year. Why will not the Senator put his amendment in a form providing that any contractor who shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy that within three months from the date of the passage of this bill or from the date of the contract he will have his yard in condition to build these ships may bid? I should have no objection to that.

Mr. MORGAN. I will do that with the greatest cheerfulness. Say "who in three months from the date of the contract shall satisfy the Secretary of the Navy that he is in a condition to comply."

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that, and I think that it perhaps relieves the bill from some objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I put in six months because I did not know how long it would take. I am not on the Naval Committee, and do not know anything about it.

Mr. HALE. Let that part of the amendment be read and I will suggest a change. We can come to some accord, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield for the reading of that part of his amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Or shall within six months from the date of the contract be fully equipped.

Mr. HALE. It wants a clause like this: "Shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. MORGAN. "Shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy that within three months from the date of the contract he will be thoroughly equipped."

Mr. HALE. That will do. Let the language be just as the Senator has it already in that respect, changing the time.

Mr. MORGAN. That is within three months from the date of the contract.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama modifies his amendment. The modified part will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The modification is:

Who shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy that within three months from the date of the contract his ship-yard will be equipped.

So as to read:

The Secretary of the Navy shall invite proposals from all American shipbuilders and builders of machinery who shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy that within three months from the date of the contract his ship-yard will be equipped for building and repairing iron and steel ships.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that. Now if the Senator will strike off the last part of his amendment referring to another feature I will accept it as a substitute for the amendment which was offered yesterday.

Mr. MORGAN. I will strike that out, but before doing so I wish to say this: I am informed that an appropriation bill would be the proper place on which to provide for the preparation of one of the navy-yards or two, as Congress may order, for the building of these ships; and I do not wish to embarrass the passage of this bill by any unnecessary amendments. I will therefore strike out the latter part of my amendment passing beyond the text of the original law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama modifies his amendment to the bill further by striking out the words which will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read the words stricken out, as follows:

And shall cause estimates to be made and submitted to Congress as to the economy of building said vessels at the navy-yards before any contract is made for building the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama as modified.

Mr. HALE. I see no objection. That is simply, with the changes which have just been agreed upon, a reaffirmation in terms of the old law now in force, and I think it better that it should be in the bill directly rather than by reference. So I have no objection now to its bieng substituted for the amendment agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, before this debate closes I want to say in a very candid spirit that I do not agree to much that is generally said here on questions of this kind that by implication involves the motives of men in this body. I do not think that parliamentary, I do not think it proper.

The name of John Roach has been paraded all over this Chamber as though he was behind the Senators who are endeavoring to build up a navy. I do say that in the absence of anything showing that Mr. Roach or any of his emissaries or agents have any influence here it is not proper to refer to him in that way. Neither Mr. Roach nor anybody connected with him that I know of, nor an individual of any description, has spoken to me in connection with this bill. Still I am a member of the Naval Committee, and in the discharge of my public duty there I have given my support to it from the honest conviction that I was acting for the best interests of the country. Upon whom else any gentleman may operate is another thing; but when it is said here that we are bringing forth a bill from the Naval Committee which proposes to put a contract into the hands of a particular individual and that individual named, it is contrary to all the proprieties.

I know that my good friend from Alabama, whose heart and generosity I appreciate, would be as far from doing it as any one. I only call attention to this matter.

Mr. MORGAN. I made no statement that this bill was intended to apply to John Roach's contract. I said that the arguments which had been made and the inferences which had been drawn to that effect would have very great force if the committee held on to an iron rule which confined the bidding to John Roach.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I say to the Senate and I say to the Senator that I do not know John Roach or any other individual in connection with this business and I have not been consulted out of doors by anybody in regard to this bill. No mortal man outside of the committee has ever addressed a word to me about it. I say that. The Senator from South Carolina very properly the other day repelled these insinuations; and yet we hear the charge repeated that there is a job in this. It was so said in regard to a bill for the building of a library the other day. The public press was reeking with these uncharitable, unparliamentary insinuations so unbecoming the Senate of the United States.

There is one word I want to say in regard to a part of the amendment of my friend from Alabama that he introduced a while ago which was conceived in a mistake to which I wish to draw his attention, because I am with him on the line he has indicated. His amendment which gives power to the Secretary of the Navy to retire a ship upon a cost for repairs of one-third of her appraised value will give him a greater power than he possesses under existing laws. That provision ought to be 30 per cent. of the estimated cost of a new ship corresponding to the one that is condemned.

Mr. HALE. We have adopted that.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I know it is adopted, and I call attention to it now because I think it is well that there should be a change. The amendment is that upon an appraisement of a ship in her existing condition she may be condemned if repairing her would cost 30 per cent. of her appraised value at the time the appraisement is made. The existing law is 20 per cent. of the estimated cost of a new ship corresponding to the ship to be condemned. So this proposition of my friend from Alabama would give the Secretary of the Navy a greater power to put out of existence the vessels now in commission than he has under the existing law.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I wish to say a word. I believe I said something the other day about Mr. Roach, and I believe the parliamentary lecture of the Senator from Florida applies to me as well as anybody else. I got my impression of Mr. John Roach in the debate of March 3, 1883, when the Senator from Florida was opposing the naval appropriation bill, or the provisions in it with regard to the building of these four vessels that are now being built. The Senator from Delaware stated in that debate that Mr. John Roach had had the Secretary of the Navy as his agent here for five years, and therefore would undoubtedly have the construction of the ships. That was the statement made in March, 1883. To-day we have the same Secretary of the Navy, and now we are going to have more contracts, and it is fair to assume that Mr. Roach will be the party who will be contracted with. If any parliamentary rule is violated when these statements are made, if they are facts, as I have no doubt they are—I have no personal knowledge on the subject, but they were stated then and not denied—I am not aware of it.

> The very head and front of my offending
> Hath this extent, no more.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. I hope that will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on agreeing to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have been a silent listener to this discussion, which has been interesting and instructive. I think that those who are acquainted with the course I have pursued in my public service know that I am not an illiberal Senator. I am not illiberal in my votes. I have rejoiced in the strength, glory, and power of this Government, and on occasions when needed there is nobody who would look with greater pleasure upon a demonstration of our power than I would. I have reached the conclusion, however, not to vote for this bill, and it is proper that I should give my reasons in a few words.

I have heard it intimated in this discussion that war is liable to afflict this country; that we are liable to collision with foreign powers. I see no liability of that kind at the present time; but if such liability did exist, if the clouds of war were gathering on our horizon, this would be one of the most inefficient and incapable measures of defense that I could possibly imagine. We might as well look to our real situation as a government, as a power. We are a long way from powerful and belligerent neighbors. It is our great good fortune that we are isolated from the rest of the world to a great extent. We have the weak power of Mexico on the south; we have the colony of Canada on the north. We are free from that attrition and friction which grow from powerful neighbors, causing strong armies and great navies to be maintained by the European powers. The consequence is that we can not pretend to be upon a war footing from year to year in anticipations which may not come in a quarter of a century, or half a century, or a century, even. We are so situated that we must rely on occasions of emergency upon the patriotism and ready resources of our people. To attempt to sustain a navy capable of coping with the powers of Europe is an absurdity, just as great an absurdity as it would be for us to keep a standing army upon the footing of Germany, or France, or England.

The argument that we are liable to be involved in war, I repeat, is no argument in favor of this bill at all, because in my judgment war is not a probability, and if it was this would be no protection. Why, Mr. President, what are the precedents of Europe? I recall some of the events that occurred during the war between the sections. One of the greatest evils that could afflict mankind would have occurred here in our country if a line had been drawn across the continent dividing us into two governments. We should have been such close, powerful, and belligerent neighbors that war would have been in constant apprehension; standing armies would have confronted each other on each side; great navies would then have been built up. Europe is a lesson to us on that subject. We should have presented the same spectacle that is presented there between foreign and rival powers.

Mr. President, we are talking about building seven ships. They are called steel cruisers, I believe. What would they be in a conflict with the great maritime powers of the world? First, I claim there is no emergency upon us, and if there was an emergency this would not be a drop in the bucket to meet it. This bill is not in the line of argument; it is not in the line of reason, for if an emergency was upon this country to build ships at all it would have to build a hundred and more.

I would like to ask what public good can result from keeping afloat seven vessels? If seven are needed, one hundred are needed. If one hundred are not needed, seven are not needed. The British navy floats 241 ships of war and fires on occasion 1,200 guns. Are you building a navy by this bill which provides for putting in the hands of executive authority four or five million dollars? Are you building a navy by it to compete with Britain's power? It only needs that the question be asked to expose the absurdity of it. We have some altercation occasionally with England. She confines our citizens in her jails whenever she pleases; she hangs them without much respect for the authorities of this Government; she holds them as long as she pleases and liberates them only when she chooses. I have thought sometimes it would be difficult to kick or coerce this Government into a war with England. Certainly I do not desire to see war with England, but if gentlemen are legislating in view of the probability of a conflict with that great power, then let them not talk to me about seven ships; let them not talk to me about a few boats as against a power which mounts more than 1,200 guns and floats nearly 300 men-of-war. We are at peace and in quiet kindness with France. She is the European republic.

Mr. BECK. Let me say to the Senator from Indiana that the last report as to the English ships of the line, after giving a list of three pages of their armor-plated and other ships, says:

> From this list it appears that there are in commission, building, or unappropriated, 415 ships of war, with 2,567 guns, aggregate burden of 1,014,535 tons, and steam-power equal to that of 710,495 horses.

About twice as much as the Senator thinks.

Mr. VOORHEES. I received my information from what I thought to be a very reliable source, and if I disclosed it everybody else would say the same; but I presume the statement which has been furnished me was made before the recent difficulties of England which led her to increase her navy to the extent stated.

Mr. BECK. This is her last report.

Mr. VOORHEES. But whether the statement I have made be correct, or, which is more likely, the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky is correct, it will be very apparent how futile, how trifling is the claim that this will be a provision against her power in case of trouble.

As I was proceeding to say, we are at peace and in fraternity with France as the great European republic. I know no cause of complaint against that power. I wish her well from the bottom of my heart as holding up as it were the torchlight of liberty in the midst of surrounding despotism. But suppose a call were made for a warlike demonstration on the part of this country against France; France has 496 men-of-war on the ocean; she mounts 2,854 guns; a larger fleet, possibly a much more powerful one, even than England has.

Will gentlemen pretend that it is an argument in favor of this bill that we are preparing for war, for a collision with forces of that nature? Germany has 86 men-of-war afloat, with more than 500 guns; Italy, with an exceptionally powerful fleet according to numbers, has also 86 men-of-war, with 570 guns; Russia sends to the waters of the world 224 men-of-war, with 561 guns mounted; and Spain, because of her colonies in the West Indies, our nearest and most dangerous neighbor, has 132 ships of war, with 517 guns.

Whom are we preparing for? Are we preparing for any of the first-class powers with these seven ships, or are we preparing for a battle with the batteaux of the Sandwich Islands?

Not only, Mr. President, have I given these numbers, but of the ships I have named France has 57 ironclads, enough to sink everything that we have afloat or that we propose to put afloat; Great Britain has 74 ironclads; Germany has 24 ironclads; Italy has 18 ironclads; Russia 31; and Spain 9.

Mr. President, I may be answered that this statement puts us at the mercy of the great powers of the world. That is true to this extent: for the first few months of war between this country and any first-rate power of Europe our Navy would be swept from the ocean; but our reliance is on that indomitable courage and resource of the American people which would enable us to put in the field and place on the water in a very short time a sufficient force to assert our honor and dignity. I remember very well that I was a member of the House of Representatives when the terrible tragedy and disaster of the Virginius took place; also when Spain built 30 gunboats in New York Harbor in violation of all the laws of neutrality to suppress Cuban liberty.

Some of the authorities at New York libeled those gunboats and sought to check their departure. I have it from the American minister then resident at Madrid that it was seriously discussed in official quarters in Spain to send their navy up to New York and cut those gunboats out of the harbor under the very flag of the United States. They held the naval strength and resources of the United States in perfect contempt so far as their West Indian possessions were concerned. I had occasion to discuss that question in the House of Representatives very fully and very elaborately. But what is the remedy for that? Shall we say therefore that we have to have a standing army and a powerful navy all the time ready for a conflict with powers that are not nearer to us than 3,000 miles of water?

This is a grave subject; one calling for the very best thought. If we are not going to build up a navy to compete and to be ready to compete, to be standing ready for war with these first-rate powers, why are we called on now to build seven ships that will be simply seven morsels to be devoured by any one of these powers? If war were imminent I would vote to build one hundred ships, I would vote to mount a thousand guns, but in time of peace we can not support such a naval armament nor sustain a great standing army; and in the absence of doing that I see no good to come, no public utility, in maintaining the seven ships any more than in maintaining seven additional regiments as a standing army to meet the men whom Germany could muster.

For these reasons I shall not vote for this bill. I might press some things in regard to the building of naval vessels. It is not pleasant for me to impugn motives, nor shall I do so. I have the greatest possible respect for the motives of Senators who differ from me on this question, the greatest possible respect for Senators who support this bill and take a different view from what I do; but I can see no object to be accomplished by the expenditure of these millions of money at this time, with no war threatening us, and, even if there were, without any prospect of accomplishing a defense against the naval powers of the world.

It is gratifying to naval officers to command good ships, and I am extremely friendly to the naval officers. I have no word of criticism to make upon them, and I have often thought they are treated with great injustice. Senators and Members of the House allow themselves sometimes to speak of naval officers being about the hotels of Washington in idleness. What are they to do? They are idle in time of peace to be ready in time of war. On the stormy coast, bearing the brunt of battle, they have earned the right to loll about hotels and in the best places they can find. I envy them not one moment of pleasure, and I say to them and to the officers of the Army, who are sometimes criticised for the reason that there are more officers than there are men to command that is true, but they have earned the right to be idle and without active command.

Men who earned their commands in time of war are entitled to respect and to leisure in time of peace. Full well we know, Mr. President, that if war came upon this country these very men, some of whom are gray and hoary and others younger, from the North and from the South, from the Federal and from the confederate ranks, wounded and scarred in many an honorable conflict, would rally to the flag and take care of the safety of this Government. But I see nothing to be accomplished by the piecemeal work we are proposing here, except to put money in the hands of those who have not thus earned the gratitude of their country.

I do not desire to say more. I have said what I have said reluctantly; but as this is a measure of importance and as I propose to vote against the judgment of many gentlemen for whom I have the greatest possible respect, I thought it was not improper that I should give my reasons for doing so.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I voted for an amendment that I thought ought to be put on this bill; but the Senate disagreed with me. Now, if I lacked an additional reason why I should vote for this appropriation, I could find it in the remarks which have just fallen from the lips of the Senator from Indiana. The very fact that England can incarcerate American citizens whenever she pleases and hold them as long as she chooses, is sufficient to induce me to vote for seven ships and I only wish that the number were one hundred and seven instead of seven.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. VOORHEES called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

Mr. HARRISON (when Mr. MANDERSON'S name was called). The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] is confined to his home by sickness. I do not know whether the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] announced a pair with him or not.

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. MITCHELL'S name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] is detained from the Senate by sickness. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER]. If here, the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] is detained at home by illness and is paired with me. Were he present, I should vote "nay" and he would doubtless vote "yea."

Mr. INGALLS. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 29, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REBATE OF TAX ON TOBACCO.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to resolution of the House of Representatives, passed February 25, asking for information relative to the rebate of tax on tobacco under the act of March, 1883; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SUPERVISING ARCHITECT OF THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to resolution of the House of Representatives, passed February 21, requesting evidence and report in the case of the investigation of the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

TRUSTEE REFORM SCHOOL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, asking that his chief clerk be made ex officio trustee of the Reform School of the District of Columbia, and that an appropriate provision for that purpose be inserted in the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CITY HALL, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter of the Attorney-General, transmitting communications and recommending an appropriation for the preservation and improvement of the City Hall, Washington, D. C.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. RAY, of New York, until Monday, March 3, and to Mr. MORRILL, until March 10.

JAMES BRIDGER.

Mr. BLAND. I ask, Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 380 for reference to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 380) for the relief of James Bridger, or his legal representatives.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

MRS. LOU GOBRIGHT M'FALLS.

Mr. COX, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 5454) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Lou Gobright McFalls; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF GENERAL PULASKI.

Mr. COX, of New York, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 5455) for the relief of the heirs of General Count Casimir Pulaski; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LANDS GRANTED TO MICHIGAN.

Mr. MAYBURY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

Whereas by act approved March 3, 1865, Congress granted 200,000 acres of land to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a breakwater, harbor, and ship-canal to connect Lake Superior and Portage Lake, on Keweenaw Point, in said State of Michigan, and afterward, by act approved July 3, 1866, made an additional grant of 200,000 acres more to said State for the same purpose; and

Whereas said State of Michigan conferred said lands on the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal Company for the purpose of constructing said breakwater, harbor, and ship-canal; and

Whereas said acts required the lands granted thereby to be selected from the alternate and odd-numbered sections (except 50,000 acres, which were to be selected from the even-numbered sections) of the public lands nearest to said harbor and canal; and

Whereas it is charged and alleged that said lands were not selected as required by said acts, but that large quantities of very valuable lands were selected all over the upper peninsula of said State, in violation of said acts, and said canal company now claims to own said lands so selected, though large quantities of them were not liable to be used to satisfy said grants; and

Whereas it appears from reports of Government engineers that said canal company never completed said breakwater, harbor, and ship-canal as contemplated and required by said granting act; and

Whereas said canal company failed to complete said breakwater, harbor, and ship-canal within the time limited by the acts of Congress extending the time for the completion of the same; and

Whereas it was provided in said granting acts that in case of the failure of the said canal company to complete said harbor and canal within the time so limited the lands so granted should revert to the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and is hereby, instructed to investigate all of said charges and allegations, together with all matters pertaining to said grants, and whether said grants, or any portions thereof, are now liable to forfeiture, with power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and report to this House by bill or otherwise.

LANDS IN COLORADO FOR AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES, ETC.

Mr. BELFORD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 5456) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands, and to secure to the State of Colorado the benefit of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating land to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. AIKEN. I am directed by the Committee on Education to report back with an amendment the resolutions which I send to the desk, and to ask that as amended the resolutions be adopted.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Whereas by an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," many of the States and Territories of the United States received grants of public lands "for the endowment and maintenance of at least one college where the leading object shall be, without excluding scientific and classical studies, and including military tactics, to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may respectively prescribe, in order to promote the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions of life;" and

Whereas a number of institutions have availed themselves of the benefits of this fund, and it is doubtful whether in some instances the true intent and purpose of this act of Congress is carried out by promoting or endeavoring to promote as the leading object "the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions of life:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Education be specially charged with the duty of inquiring into the working and management of such institutions as may be using the fund so appropriated, and of reporting specifically in the case of each; also to recommend such measures as will secure to the industrial classes the benefits intended by such act.

Resolved, That said committee shall have full power to send for persons and papers and witnesses, and to exercise all other powers requisite to the making of a thorough investigation into the facts in each case.

Mr. AIKEN. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Education, to whom were referred the resolutions of Mr. HOUK, of Tennessee, relating to the fund for the benefit of agricultural and mechanical colleges, beg leave to report, that they have had the same under consideration, and recommend that they be amended by striking out the second resolution, to wit:

"Resolved, That said committee shall have the power to send for persons, papers, and witnesses, and to exercise all other powers requisite to the making of a thorough investigation into the facts in each case."

And, as amended, that the resolution be passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Reserving the right to object, I ask that the first resolution be again reported. I understand the recommendation is that the second resolution be stricken out.

Mr. AIKEN. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the resolution as reported by the committee does not incur one additional dollar of expense.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana simply reserves the right to object, and asks that the first resolution be reported again.

The first resolution was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that to that extent the inquiry is very proper.

Mr. SPEAKER. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, which is to strike out the second resolution.

The amendment was adopted.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. AIKEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISEASES AMONG ANIMALS.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to have printed and referred to the Committee on Agriculture a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State and a dispatch from the American consul at Birmingham.

Mr. RANDALL. On what subject?

Mr HATCH, of Missouri. On diseases among cattle. This is a communication I received this morning. I am sorry it was not presented to me forty-eight hours sooner, as I think it would have made some difference in the vote of yesterday on the bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture.

There was no objection, and the communication was referred, with its inclosures, to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. HUNT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House bill No. 4987 for the encouragement of the American merchant marine and to promote commercial and postal relations with foreign countries be made the special order after the morning hour for Wednesday, March 19, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, but not to interfere with revenue and appropriation bills and reports from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Or prior orders.

Mr. HUNT. I will modify the resolution so that the assignment shall not interfere with prior orders.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would not interfere with prior orders.

Mr. HOLMAN. The language of the resolution is "and reports from the Committee on Public Lands." It seems to me that only allows the reports, not the consideration of the bills.

Mr. HUNT. I will modify the resolution to meet the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will again be read as modified by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House bill No. 4987 for the encouragement of the American merchant marine and to promote commercial and postal relations with foreign countries be made the special order after the morning hour for Wednesday, March 19, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, but not to interfere with revenue and appropriation bills and reports and consideration of bills from the Committee on Public Lands and prior orders of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CLERICAL FORCE IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations. I am directed to report back, with the recommendation that it be adopted, the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House whether any additional clerical force is required in his Department for the purpose of adjusting and paying claims for the rebates on tobacco, snuff, cigars, &c.; and, if so, what force is required.

The SPEAKER. The Chair laid before the House this morning a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury on that subject.

Mr. RANDALL. This resolution had better be adopted.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the President pro tempore of the Senate, under the requirements of section 1327 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, had appointed Senator CONGER of Michigan and Senator COKE of Texas members of the Board of Visitors to attend the next examination of cadets of the Military Academy at West Point.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 186) for the relief of Frank Galt.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 310) to amend the law relative to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. 436) for the relief of William J. Gamble; and

A bill (S. 716) for the relief of Eliza Howard Powers.

CHARGES OF DESERTION FROM THE NAVY.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to ask unanimous consent to report for consideration at this time a bill to relieve certain appointed and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps of the charges of desertion. The bill simply extends the provisions of House bill 4383, passed a few days ago, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, removing certain charges of desertion from soldiers of the United States Army who remained in their command up to a certain period.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I demand the regular order. To-day is private-bill day, and as the Private Calendar has but one day in the week, and has not had a day for some time, I must call for the regular order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman will allow this bill to pass.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is a bill that is likely to cause discussion.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I must insist upon the demand for the regular order, with no disrespect to my friend from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE].

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for. To-day being Friday, the regular order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-third vote.

The question was taken by a viva voce vote; but before the Speaker announced the result,

Mr. MCMILLIN withdrew the motion.

Mr. REESE. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] to yield to me for a moment.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done while the demand for the regular order is pending. The regular order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature, this being Friday.

SPANISH FERRY-BOAT NUESTRA SEÑORA DE REGLA.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to submit an additional report upon the bill (H. R. 2842) to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York in the case of the Spanish ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla, now on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is it a private bill?

Mr. DORSHEIMER. It is not.

The SPEAKER. Then it is not in order under this call. This being Friday, reports of a private nature only are in order under this call.

DISTRIBUTION OF ARMS TO THE STATES.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back with a favorable recommendation House bill 4864, repealing so much of the act approved March 3, 1875, as provides that so much of the appropriation between January 1, 1861, and April 9, 1865, under the act of April 23, 1808, as would have been used for arms to be distributed to the several States be covered into the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. That bill is not in order under this call, this being a call for reports of a private nature.

OREGON VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report adversely House bill 1306, relating to the muster-roll of the Oregon volunteers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state again to gentlemen on the floor that under this call no bills except those of a private nature can be reported.

Mr. CUTCHEON. This bill is of a strictly private nature, relating to private claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood from the title that it related to the volunteer soldiers of the State of Oregon. [After a pause.] There is some doubt about it, but the Chair will receive the report.

The bill was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FORT RILEY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. CUTCHEON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported adversely the bill (H. R. 519) to provide for the sale to actual settlers of a portion of the Fort Riley military reservation, in the State of Kansas; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I wish to give notice to the House that it is my desire on to-morrow to call up for further consideration the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I now submit my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar.

GENERAL ALFRED PLEASONTON.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1101) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton a major-general, reported by Mr. BAYNE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the laws regulating appointments in the Army be, and they are hereby, suspended, and suspended only for the purposes of this act; and the President is hereby authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Alfred Pleasonton, of New York, late a major-general of volunteers in the Army of the United States, brevet major-general in the Army of the United States, and thereupon to place him, the said Alfred Pleasonton, upon the retired-list of the Army as such major-general, without regard and in addition to the number now authorized by law of said retired-list.

The amendments were as follows:

In line 11 strike out the words "such major-general" and insert the words "a brigadier-general."

Amend the title so as to read:

A bill authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton a brigadier-general.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1101) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton a major-general, respectfully reports:

That the committee has considered this bill and reports it with a favorable recommendation with the following amendment: Strike out in line 11 the words "such major-general," and insert in lieu thereof "a brigadier-general;" and that the title of the bill be amended accordingly.

The Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-seventh Congress made a favorable report on a bill identical in language and import with this one; and it being believed by your committee that the report so made adequately sets forth most cogent and convincing reasons for the passage of that bill, it adopts that report in support of the present bill. The report is as follows:

[House Report No. 1704, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, to accompany bill H. R. 5525.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5525) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton a major-general, respectfully reports:

Alfred Pleasonton graduated at the West Point Military Academy in 1844, and was appointed a brevet second lieutenant in the Army, and assigned to Captain Sumner's (afterward General Sumner) company of the First Regiment of United States Dragoons, which was stationed at Fort Atkinson, Iowa Territory. In 1845 he was one of the command under Sumner that marched to Devil's Lake, near the Canada line, to warn the Canadian half-breeds from coming into the United States to hunt buffalo and disturb our Indians. The expedition was successful, and accomplished a march of 3,000 miles in five months.

In the spring of 1846, Pleasonton, having been promoted to be second lieutenant of the Second Regiment of Dragoons, joined Captain May's company of that regiment, at Corpus Christi, Tex., as part of the army of occupation under General Taylor. In the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma he was distinguished, and was brevetted on the recommendation of General Taylor for his conduct in the charge of May's squadron of dragoons at Resaca de la Palma, which resulted in the capture of General La Vega, many prisoners, and a battery of nine guns. He served with the army of General Taylor to the end of the Mexican war, and then marched with his company from Monterey, Mexico, to Santa Fé, N. Mex., in the fall of 1848. After very active service in that Territory during the winter, he proceeded in the spring of 1849 to join the staff of Gen. Persifor F. Smith, in California, and marched across the country from Santa Fé to San Francisco, with a small detachment of men, by the way of Colorado and Utah.

Pleasonton remained in California until 1850, when, having been promoted to be first lieutenant, he returned to New Mexico and was placed in command of his company. His service for the next two years brought him in contact with the Apaches, the Navajoes, and the Utah Indians of that country, and in numerous campaigns and engagements against these Indians he learned the rough art of savage warfare.

In 1852 he was ordered on the recruiting service, where he remained until 1854, when he was appointed the adjutant of his regiment, and repaired to Fort Chadbourne, Texas, where he remained until the winter of 1855, when he was promoted to a captain. He joined the expedition against the Sioux Indians, commanded by General Harney, at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, in the spring of that year, and served with the expedition, in command of his company, until the winter of 1856, when he was appointed the assistant adjutant-general of the expedition, and remained in that capacity until the Indians made peace in that summer.

In the fall of 1856 Pleasonton was selected by General Harney as his adjutant-general on an expedition to remove the Seminole Indians from Florida. The winter was spent in a hard and severe campaign against these Indians in the swamps and everglades, which resulted in their complete defeat, and they were removed to Arkansas in the spring of 1857.

Serious political troubles occurring at this time in Kansas, General Harney was ordered to the command of the troops in that Territory, and Captain Pleasonton accompanied him as adjutant-general. It was in the summer of this year that the Utah expedition was organized by General Harney and his staff, and was afterwards placed under the command of General Albert Sidney Johnston.

In the fall of 1858, an Indian war breaking out in Oregon, General Harney was ordered there to take command, and Pleasonton was assigned to him as his chief staff officer. The Indians were brought to terms during the ensuing winter, and the country was in a state of profound peace in the summer of 1859 and until 1860, when General Harney was relieved from duty in Oregon, and Pleasonton returned with him to Washington.

In March, 1861, General Scott ordered Pleasanton to join his company, then at Camp Floyd, in Utah. He proceeded as far as Saint Joseph, Mo., and was detained there for want of transportation, when the news of the firing on Fort Sumter satisfied him it was his duty to return to the East. On arriving in Philadelphia he found Washington was cut off from the North, and that the Government had placed General Patterson in command of the Department of Washington, extending from Philadelphia to Washington. Pleasanton immediately reported to him, and was sent to Wilmington, Del., to raise a force to protect the railroad to Havre de Grace, and also Dupont's powder-mills, which contained at that time the materials belonging to the Government for making powder at the rate of 30,000 pounds a day for a period of eighteen months. He succeeded in less than a week in organizing, arming, and equipping a regiment of 1,000 men; but upon application being made by the regiment to General Scott to permit Pleasonton to accept the command of it, Scott's only reply was an order for Pleasonton to join his company in Utah. Pleasanton obeyed the order. He could have resigned from the Army and accepted the colonelcy of the regiment; but as the Government at that time was in the throes of a civil war, he considered it his highest duty to obey its behests.

Shortly after his arrival in Utah the news of the battle of Bull Run was received and also orders for the troops to proceed to Washington. Pleasanton reached Washington in command of his regiment, the Second Dragoons, in the fall of 1861, having marched 1,100 miles, from Utah to Saint Joseph, Mo., and then transported the men and horses of the command about the same distance by rail to Washington.

When the Army of the Potomac moved to Yorktown Pleasonton's regiment of dragoons formed part of it, and served with headquarters and on detached service throughout that campaign, sometimes covering a retreat, sometimes in advance, but rendered such efficient service that upon the arrival of the Army at Harrison's Landing Pleasonton was promoted to be a brigadier-general of volunteers, his rank at that time in the regular Army being that of major. A few days after his assignment to the command of a brigade of cavalry he distinguished himself in the second battle of Malvern Hill, capturing many prisoners, and showing his ability to fight cavalry in large masses. He covered the retreat of the Army from the Chickahominy, and was among the last to embark from Yorktown to Washington. On his arrival at Washington General McClellan assigned him to the command of all the cavalry and horse artillery of the Army; and it was from this time that the Union cavalry began its career of distinction and glory, which it held to the close of the war. Starting in advance of the Army from Washington, with only one brigade of cavalry and two batteries of horse artillery, Pleasonton defeated the enemy at Poolesville, Barnesville, Frederick City, and brought him to bay at South Mountain. He reconnoitered that position, and finding two mountain roads, one to the north and the other to the south of it, he suggested turning the enemy by both flanks, which was afterward successfully accomplished by the Army. Rapidly pursuing, immediately after the battle, with the cavalry, he overtook the enemy's cavalry near Boonesville, and after a fierce fight defeated them with severe loss, forcing his way to the main body on Antietam Creek, at Sharpsburg. While thus actively engaged Pleasonton found time to organize his scattered cavalry, and had shown such energy and judgment in doing so that he collected 4,000 cavalry and formed them into four brigades, and with four batteries of horse artillery he held the center of the Union position throughout the battle of Antietam. He took the advance of the Army into Virginia after the battle, fighting the enemy's cavalry at Martinsburg, Purcellville, Union, Upperville, Barber's Cross-Roads, Waterloo, and other places, being invariably successful.

In the campaign of Fredericksburg he commanded the first division of cavalry, on duty with the first grand division of the Army, commanded by Major-General Sumner. The battle of Fredericksburg virtually finished that campaign.

In the campaign of Chancellorsville, Pleasanton went into the field with one small brigade of cavalry of three regiments and one horse battery, but it was his good fortune to be at the critical part of the field at the proper time; that is, where the Eleventh Corps became panic-stricken and ran away when Stonewall Jackson attacked them on the 2d of May, 1863. In reference to this action the joint committee of the two Houses of Congress on the conduct of the war report as follows:

"About 6 o'clock in the afternoon a rattling fire of musketry was heard on the right, but nothing indicating a very serious engagement. Almost immediately, however, from some cause not fully evident from the testimony, the extreme right division of the Eleventh Corps was stampeded, and, flying along the line of the Eleventh Corps, threw the whole corps into confusion and swept it from the field. Steps were at once taken to arrest the fugitives and prevent the panic being extended to the whole army. Berry's division of the Third Corps and a brigade of the Second Corps were directed to cover the rear of the Eleventh Corps, and, if possible, to retake and hold the position they had abandoned. This, however, they were unable to do, the enemy occupying it in great force before our troops could reach it.

"It will be remembered that some hours before, General Sickles, with two divisions of his corps, had been ordered to advance for the purpose of operating against the column of the enemy under Jackson. The giving way of the right left General Sickles in a very exposed and critical position; but upon being informed of the condition of affairs he at once took measures to withdraw his force, which was successfully done, and without much loss. The enemy, under Jackson, continued to advance after the panic-stricken troops until checked by General Pleasonton, who had collected and brought into position some artillery for that purpose. Although a cavalry officer, he handled the artillery with exceeding great judgment and effectiveness. His skill, energy, daring, and promptness upon this occasion contributed greatly to arrest the disaster which for a time threatened the whole army. His conduct upon this and many other occasions marks him as one of the ablest generals in our service, and as deserving of far higher consideration than, from some cause, he appears to have received. It was during this attack the rebel General Jackson was mortally wounded. The enemy were repulsed with great loss, and active operations ceased for the night."

Pleasanton was now placed in command of the cavalry corps of the Army of the Potomac by Major-General Hooker, and the campaign of Gettysburg was opened by his crossing the Rappahannock and attacking the enemy's cavalry, under Stuart, at Beverly Ford and Brandy Station, on the 9th of June, 1863. He had 6,000 cavalry, 3,000 infantry, and 36 pieces of artillery. Stuart had 18,000 cavalry and upward of 40 pieces of artillery. The battle began at 5 o'clock in the morning, and lasted until 7 o'clock in the evening. By this action Pleasonton ascertained the design of General Lee of moving into Pennsylvania, having captured official correspondence indicating the movement. The loss of the Union cavalry on that day was 1,000 men, but the loss of the enemy's cavalry was much greater, stated to have been 2,500 men. Moving rapidly from Beverly Ford to Aldie, in the Bull Run Mountains, the enemy were met and again defeated, and pursued to Middleburg and Upperville and finally driven over the Blue Ridge Mountains. It was after the battle at Upperville that President Lincoln appointed Pleasanton a major-general of volunteers, to date from June 22, 1863.

At Frederick City, Pleasanton, finding the enemy's cavalry so superior in numbers, applied for and obtained another division of cavalry from Washington, to which he promoted his aids-de-camp, Custer and Farnsworth, to be brigadier-generals. Lee was at this time moving his army towards Chambersburg. The Army of the Potomac was put in motion by General Meade in the direction of Columbia and the Susquehanna River. The cavalry was placed to cover its front and flanks. The first division, under General Buford, was ordered by Pleasanton to Gettysburg to hold that position at all hazards; the second division, under General Gregg, moved on the right of the army, and the third division, under General Kilpatrick, in front toward Harrisburg.

At Hanover the third division struck Stuart, laden with plunder, which was recaptured, and the enemy driven off with great loss.

At Gettysburg General Buford met the enemy on the morning of the 1st of July, 1863, and with the first division fought so hard to hold the position that he urged the necessity for the whole army to support him if it was expected we should retain it. Accordingly, the different corps of the army were marched in that direction, and the result was the battle of Gettysburg.

The cavalry throughout that battle protected the flanks of the army, and sustained very severe losses in so doing, and followed in pursuit of the enemy immediately after the battle.

In the winter of 1864 the committee of the two Houses of Congress on the conduct of the war called upon the different generals for their views with reference to the prosecution of the war in the next campaign. The members of the committee were so much impressed with the plan submitted by Pleasonton that they recommended to President Lincoln to place him in command of the Army of the Potomac, give him the men and material he required, and hold him responsible to execute that plan. The President was favorably inclined to do so, but other influences prevented its consummation, and the result was that in the spring of 1864 Pleasonton was ordered to the Department of Missouri, at Saint Louis. In the fall of that year the States of Missouri and Kansas were invaded by General Sterling Price with a greatly superior force of cavalry and artillery to that which could be put into the field by the Federal commander, Maj. Gen. William S. Rosecrans. In his official report General Rosecrans describes the results of that campaign as follows:

"With less than 7,000 effective cavalry, have pursued, overtaken, beaten in several engagements, and finally routed an invading cavalry, variously estimated at from 15,000 to 20,000 men, re-enforced by 6,000 armed recruits from Missouri, taken from them ten pieces of artillery, two stands of colors, 1,958 prisoners of war, a large number of horses, mules, wagons, and small-arms, compelled them to destroy most of their remaining wagon trains and plunder, blasted all the political schemes of the rebels and traitors who concerted with Price to revolutionize Missouri, destroy Kansas, and turn the State and Presidential elections against the Union cause, and by one triumph in the late elections have given to gallant and suffering Missouri the fairest prospect she has ever yet seen of future freedom, peace, prosperity—all the fruit of a campaign of forty-eight days, in which most of our victorious troops had never before seen a great battle. Rarely, during this or any war, has cavalry displayed more persevering energy in pursuit, more impetuous courage and gallantry in attacking, regardless of superior numbers, or had its efforts crowned with greater fruits of success. Major-General Pleasanton deserves the thanks of the country for the able manner in which he handled and fought the cavalry, and the brilliant and fruitful victories he won over triple his own force. I hope he may receive promotion in the regular Army."

This campaign closed the war in Missouri and west of the Mississipi River.

After the war closed and the regular Army had been reorganized Pleasonton resigned, in 1868, as he found his relative rank and position in the Army, after twenty-four years of the most active service, to be much lower than that which he had held before the war.

General Pleasonton is now well advanced in years. Having given the best years of his life to the military service of his country, he has failed to make that provision for himself which he deserves. Having a military training and but few if any business aptitudes, his application appeals with redoubled force to the favorable consideration of Congress. The delicacy of manner with which such an appeal ought to be made precludes the statement of details, but your committee is thoroughly satisfied that he needs the kindly aid of Congress.

The committee therefore reports the bill back to the House with a recommendation that it be passed.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not know I have anything to say regarding this measure. The report is very full. It gives the details of the services rendered by General Pleasonton to his country, beginning with the Mexican war, where he distinguished himself and was brevetted, all through the Indian wars on our Western frontier, and all through the late civil war, his bright military career culminating with the final victories achieved by the Union Army in the war of the rebellion. He was a graduate of West Point. He gave the best years of his life to his country. He resigned his commission in 1868 and made an honest endeavor to earn his livelihood in the civil struggle for existence; but he found himself unequal to the emergencies that constantly beset a man in this world. He was unprepared to cope with his fellow-men in business ways, because he had not been trained in those things at all. His training was purely a military training. What he received at the hands of the Government in giving him an education he fully returned in the way of adequate and great and loyal services as a commanding officer of the cavalry of the Army.

One of the earliest feats of General Pleasonton's military career was his conduct at Resaca de la Palma, in Mexico, which resulted in the capture of General La Vega, a large number of prisoners, and a battery of nine guns. For this he was promoted. And his services in the wars in the West, and indeed his military services everywhere, not only attracted the attention of his countrymen, but elicited their commendation and applause and won for him brevets and finally the thanks of Congress.

Now, sir, in one word, General Pleasonton is poor. He is without means, and he is entitled, I think, as every other man who has done equally good service to his country, to the protection of this Government. While a great many men were at home making money, because during the war it was a profitable time to men of genius in that respect, Pleasonton was out serving his country, and he made nothing. There are scarcely any men who served during the war who had successes in making money. It was the men who remained at home who could take advantage of favorable business conditions to make money. Pleasonton is now without adequate means of support.

I do not want to present the unfortunate condition of General Pleasonton to-day. I do not want to say in words how necessary it is that this Government should afford him kindly assistance. If any gentleman will make private inquiry he will be able thoroughly to satisy himself there is no man now living in this country who deserves better a recognition of this kind at the hands of the Government.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to a question of order. There is so much confusion in the Hall that we can not hear the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. BAYNE. I was saying I can not present, and will not in words, the necessities of General Pleasonton. He is a man about 60 years of age. He is not in good health, and he has nothing wherewith to support himself. He has no business qualifications. And I say to you from my personal knowledge he deserves and needs the relief afforded by this bill.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. What pay will this give him?

Mr. BAYNE. I think the retired-pay will be about $3,000.

Mr. STORM. What was General Pleasonton's rank in the Army when he resigned?

Mr. BAYNE. He was a major-general in the volunteer service and a major in the regular Army. In regard to that I may say it was a spirit of pride, perhaps, to a certain extent, that influenced General Pleasonton to tender his resignation. By an unfortunate series of laws enacted by Congress the cavalry of the United States was divided into four branches. One division of cavalry was called the dragoons, another was called cavalry, and I have forgotten what the other subdivisions were, but there were two other subdivisions. When Mr. Jefferson Davis was Secretary of War he made this division. The language of the acts of Congress would seem to imply it was a proper division to be made, and no fault was found with him for having made that division. But the effect was to put in regiments of new cavalry and to put the officers who were given commands in those new regiments over officers who held anterior commissions; and when promotions were made in consequence of that officers who were subordinate to those who were in the branch of the cavalry called the dragoons of the service, officers who were in what was called the cavalry service were promoted to receive brevets and commissions for ranks far beyond what they would have had but for this unfortunate complication made by act of Congress.

My attention has been called by my friend from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] to some of the remarkable services rendered by Pleasonton and not enumerated in the report. There is one passage here from Doubleday's Chancellorsville and Gettysburg which I shall ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The thickets being unfavorable to cavalry, Sickles had sent Pleasonton back to Hazel Grove with two mounted regiments, the Eighth New York, the Seventeenth Pennsylvania, and Martin's battery, while the Sixth New York was scouting the woods dismounted. Upon reaching the open space which he had left when he went to the front, Pleasonton found the place full of the debris of the combat—men, horses, caissons, ambulances—all rushing furiously to the rear. To clear the way he charged on the flying mass, at Sickles' suggestion, who had ridden in advance of his troops, which were still behind at the furnace. Sickles directed Pleasonton to take command of the artillery, and the latter hastily collected twenty-two guns, consisting of his own and the Third Corps batteries. Unfortunately there was not time to load or aim, for the rebels were close at hand and their triumphant yells were heard as they took possession of the works Buschbeck had so gallantly defended. In another moment our troops would have been compelled to give up this advantageous position, which was on an eminence overlooking Chancellorsville and the plank road, and which was really the key of the battlefield. There was but one way to delay Jackson; some force must be sacrificed, and Pleasonton ordered Major Peter Keenan, commanding the Eighth Pennsylvania Cavalry, to charge the ten thousand men in front with his four hundred. Keenan knew if he threw his little force into that seething mass of infantry horses and men would go down on all sides, and there would be few left to tell the tale. A sad smile lit up his noble countenance as he said, "General, I will do it." At thirty-four years of age, literally impaled on the bayonets of the enemy, he laid down his life and saved the Army from capture and his country from the unutterable degradation of the establishment of slavery in the Northern States. History will record the services rendered on that occasion as worthy to be classed with the sacrifices of Arnold Winkelried in Switzerland and the Chevalier d'Assas in France.

A large part of his command was lost, but the short interval thus gained was of priceless value. Pleasonton was enabled to clear a space in front of him and to bring twenty-two guns loaded with double canister to bear upon the enemy. They came bursting over the parapet they had just taken with loud and continuous yells, and formed line of battle within three hundred yards of Pleasonton, displaying a United States flag to deceive him. He soon detected the imposture and fired into their masses with all his guns at once. The discharge seemed fairly to blow them back over the works from which they had just emerged. Their artillery, under Colonel Crutchfield, which had been brought up to sweep the plank road, was almost annihilated by the fire of the battery on the plank road. This gave time to reload the guns.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know that I have anything further to say regarding this bill. If there is no opposition to it (and I suppose there will be none, as I think everybody must feel in the same way towards this worthy soldier) I will move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. There are some amendments pending to the bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BAYNE. That is so. I will ask that the amendments be agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to oppose the bill.

Mr. BAYNE. Then I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. STEELE. I dislike very much to be the champion for the opposition to such bills as this. But there is no allegation in the report that there is any necessity whatever for the action here proposed. There is nothing in the report that shows that this officer was eligible for retirement on the day he resigned from the Army. There is nothing to show that he might not have continued in service until this day if he had so minded.

The report says that he resigned after the war closed and the regular Army had been organized. He resigned in 1868, as he found his relative rank in the Army, after twenty-four years of the most active service, was then much lower than that which he had held before the war. That is the statement of the report. I refer gentlemen to the Army Register in order to ascertain whether it will bear out that statement or not.

We find, on the contrary, that Colonel Brackett, now the sixth colonel in the Army, was in 1861 the next below Pleasonton, and in 1868, when Pleasonton resigned, Brackett was still the next to him on the list. In 1861 James H. Carleton was seven files above Pleasonton. In 1868, when Pleasonton resigned, Carleton was only three files above him, showing that Pleasonton then held more than his relative position.

But that is not all. In 1866 the President of the United States tendered to Pleasonton a commission as lieutenant-colonel. I am led to believe, and I do believe, that because it was not a colonel's commission Pleasonton declined it. In 1868 he resigned of his own free will, and so far as we know at that time he was a sound, able-bodied man, so much so that he was appointed Commissioner of Internal Revenue and served as such.

Why should we take this man from civil life and place him on the retired-list of the Army? I find that two brigadier-generals, five colonels, four lieutenant-colonels, and twenty-three majors, have gone out of the Army since 1868. Every one of them was a meritorious officer, or they would not have been retained in the service. Are we going to say to the people of this country that because an able-bodied man leaves the Army of his own free will, and after the lapse of ten or fifteen years comes back to us and says, "My career as a civilian has been a failure and I want you to put me on the retired-list of the Army"—are we going to say to the people of the country that we will do that?

I ask gentlemen to understand that instead of giving Pleasonton a pension of $8 a month, or $20, or $25, or even $70 a month, the highest that is given in cases of total disability, it is proposed to give him the pay of a brigadier-general on the retired-list. A volunteer officer, who served during the war and lost both arms and both legs, receives the paltry sum of $70 a month. By this bill it is proposed to put Pleasonton on the retired-list of the Army as a brigadier-general and to say in effect that he is more worthy than any of his fellows who lost their health, their arms, their legs, and their sight, and instead of giving him a pension of $70 a month we will give him $4,125 a year.

Is that justice? Can we look these poor maimed soldiers in the face, who gave the best of their lives to the service of their country, and say to them that we will give this man, notwithstanding he resigned, the sum of $4,125 a year, while his poor maimed comrade receives but $840 a year? And it should be understood, as I before said, that in the one case there is total disability, and in the other there is none.

The retired-list of the Army is said to be an incubus. Do not gentlemen know, and if not I will refer them to the official reports, that every measure of legislation of this kind tends to make it more so? Since 1866 there have been restored to the Army one hundred and one men. If we make a precedent of this kind where can we stop?

If there is any prospect of such a bill as this passing, I will offer an amendment, which I do not see how gentlemen can vote against, that every case equally meritorious with this shall be treated as you propose to treat this case. If we are going to put Mr. Pleasanton on the retired-list of the Army, why not put every disabled soldier and officer who is totally helpless on the same footing with him?

I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I am opposed to this bill, but if any gentleman desires to speak in favor of it I will wait for the present.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I rise to say a few words to the Committee of the Whole in favor of the passage of the bill which we have reported from our committee for the relief of General Alfred Pleasonton. I am in favor of the bill as an act of recognition for distinguished and peculiar services by the gentleman in question.

After the reading of the report, which details the services of Pleasonton from his first entrance into the Army down to the time when he ceased to have connection with it, it is unnecessary for me to recapitulate what is there stated. I do not ask the Committee of the Whole to regard this bill as simply providing a support for a former officer of the Army, who, having been worn out in the service, and being without means, comes to us and asks us to prevent him from suffering and starvation.

If it were placed on the ground of a mere pension, then it would be liable to the objection raised by the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], although and albeit I do not admire that kind of objection which sometimes finds excuse for the bestowal of money broadcast and at other times withholds with a pinching hand and appeals to the popular cry of economy.

Mr. STEELE. May I ask the honorable gentleman to what he refers when he says that I at any time have voted to bestow money broadcast? Will the gentleman cite any one instance of the kind?

Mr. ROSECRANS. The gentleman will excuse me from replying to him now.

Alfred Pleasonton was known to me when he was in the corps of cadets, and his career, as related in the report which has been read, is familiar to me. But his services during the war attracted my attention from the time when he began to develop a new career for our cavalry.

It takes time to harden cavalry for service, and I am aware that they had gone through a school of preparation. But the spirit of that young cavalry officer who was placed in command just after the second battle of Bull Run, and who continued in command from that time on, elicited the admiration of the country. And even the Richmond Dispatch, referring to the battle between his cavalry and that of Early in the Shenandoah Valley, said that it was probably a contest between the élite of both armies.

No inconsiderable portion of that efficiency was due to the military genius of this cavalry officer whom we now propose to mark with some distinction. I do not yield to any man on this floor in zealous advocacy of a broad and liberal policy of recognition for the military services of our defenders during the war of the rebellion or care for those who need that care. I do not understand that I am detracting from that spirit when I stand before this committee and say that for my part I shall vote to put a mark of distinction upon a man whose services have been so eminent as those of the beneficiary in this bill. It is on this ground that I appeal to my fellow-members.

When gentlemen say to me, "If one man is admitted there will be others," I say, whenever you can present to me a man whose record of service is as distinguished as that of General Pleasonton, and ask me as a public man to vote for an expression of respect and esteem which shall be adequate, I am ready to vote as soon for such recognition for any other man as for him.

Gentlemen say, "By this measure you will open the door." How wide shall we open the door? How many men have we who have served the country with such distinction as General Pleasonton has? Show me how many and then we shall see how many will come into the door that will be opened. For my part I must say I do not think the train that will come through this open door will ruin this Republic or ruin the Democratic party if its members happen to vote for this bill.

I might detain the committee, if it were necessary, by recapitulating the facts of General Pleasonton's career; but the pith of it all is that Alfred Pleasonton has rendered great and distinguished service to his country. His fate as to promotion was not fortunate. I have reason to know some of the causes of this, and they were not such as to lower him in our estimation or in the estimation of other American citizens. On the contrary, as to the motive of his resignation I know, and my brethren of the Army on the floor of this House know, that the men who were the most distinguished in the military service were not those who were best adapted to get out of it all possible personal advancement. On the contrary, the man who has rendered valuable service in the field is not generally the sort of a man that is adapted to hanging around and urging his claims for promotion. I think it pretty clear from the record that Alfred Pleasonton's promotion up to 1866 was in no measure adequate to his deserts. This being my impression, I honestly and candidly think I am right when I say that the fact of General Pleasonton's resignation and his complaints that he was not promoted should not in my estimation count against him when I am asked to vote in favor of this bill. Much less do I see cause for that sort of prejudice which my friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] appears desirous to excite when he asserts that General Pleasonton scorned a lieutenant-colonelcy. It may be that he did so. I know of people who had a right to scorn things of that sort. I know of people who were overslaughed, while others, and not a few, who did not deserve half so well were promoted. It does not by any means follow that a man who happened to refuse promotion which was offered him showed thereby disrespect to this great Government or was deserving of punishment.

Mr. STEELE. I said that General Pleasonton resigned, according to the report, because he found himself below others in relative rank; and I undertook to show that he might have advanced a grade in July, 1866, but he refused to accept the advancement.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I understand the gentleman. But the general effect of what he said was to leave a rather unfavorable impression on the committee. I am not undertaking to combat it; but I say for myself that the fact referred to does not have that effect on my mind, but the contrary.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that more need not be said by me. I yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS].

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Chairman, there is undoubtedly much force in the remark of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] that there is a seeming injustice to volunteer officers who served during the war, and who were horribly wounded or badly debilitated by the accidents of the service, in the fact that they should have to content themselves with small pensions, while officers of the regular Army are placed upon a retired-list with a comparatively large salary. But for all this, the ground upon which the retired-list of the Army is founded is firm and tenable.

Those who went into the volunteer service did so with a distinct understanding. They knew that if they survived the terrible incidents of war their promotion to higher grades would be rapid in a degree unknown to the regular service. They went forth to walk the shining fields of glory and to gain such distinction as they might; and when maimed or wounded or disabled they received the pension that a generous country had provided. But experience has taught all nations that a regular army establishment is a dire necessity; that as long as man has anything worth fighting for he must be ready to defend it. In order to make this establishment effective Government has provided that when a man enters its service young, devotes all his life to his duties, trains himself for their performance, and waits upon its orders, he shall be provided for in his old age, when he is fit for nothing else. This not only out of justice to the individual, but also that the organization be not weighted down with superannuated officers. So that to men who enter the service, who remain and devote themselves entirely to it, who learn no other business, who are dependent all their lives upon a salary, thereby relinquishing the chances of distinction in civil life and of winning the fortunes that come to other men, it is part of their contract that at the end of long service they shall be supported by the Government for the rest of their days. And, Mr. Chairman, this is the difference which lies at the foundation of the retired-list for the regular service as contrasted with the pension-list of the volunteer service of the United States.

But we are now told, sir, that General Pleasonton retired from the Army. True; but, Mr. Chairman, look at his record and his years of service. Graduating before the war with Mexico, appointed a young officer in the forces of our advancing Army, he followed the flag of his country from West Point to the Halls of the Montezumas. On every battlefield in Mexico he distinguished himself and was repeatedly brevetted for gallant conduct. From all of his old commanders, the officers of the Army who afterward divided and joined one side or the other in our late civil war, from all of them under whom he served he received the most unstinted encomiums and the very highest marks of distinction.

After the close of that triumphant and glorious war which added so much to the power and the extent of our country his arduous duties were but begun. He was one of the men of that little American army who went out to hold in check and in peace the powerful Indian tribes that then dominated the Western plains and held their power in the fastnesses of the unexplored hills—one of the advance skirmish lines that marked routes across the trackless plains and opened passes through the frowning mountains that the great army of pioneers might move on and settle and reclaim the vast areas of the West—one of the distinguished figures who graduated from the line of the frontier army and developed and grew into notice and distinction upon the remotest borders of the Republic.

Coming from the wilds of Utah at the summons to the war which shook the hills around us, he received a position in the cavalry forces of the Army and gave the benefits of his training and experience to the Government and the generals who were endeavoring to shape into an army the undisciplined volunteers. It took us longer to create an effective cavalry arm than it did to discipline our infantry and organize a scientific and effective artillery. Indeed, that arm of the service was inferior during the first year of the war, and in Virginia at least unable to compete with the dashing and enterprising horsemen of the confederacy that made Ashby noted and Stuart and Rosser famous before the war was a year old. This effective aid to armies was lost to us in Virginia, and much disaster might have been avoided and much advance made if our generals had only been provided with an effective cavalry to warn them of the movements and check the operations of an enemy familiar with their own country and amply advised of all our plans. So when General Hooker, after the disaster of Fredericksburg, made the sarcastic inquiry, "Who ever saw a dead cavalryman?" the other overburdened arms of the service answered, "Who, indeed!"

To the command of this cavalry Pleasonton was assigned. He organized it, drilled it, equipped it. He formed into proper divisions. He relieved incompetent leaders and picked out to command it Averill, Custer, Crook, Gregg, Farnsworth, and Mackenzie. He made it an efficient engine of defense and offense; and under these beau-sabres it wore out even the splendid cavaliers of Virginia and the gallant horsemen of the South, than whom bolder riders or braver troopers never sat in the saddle. The names of the men that he chose for his leaders shine luminously on the dark page of war, and part of the renown that they won must ever belong to the man who organized and led them.

You all know that among the difficulties of the advance upon Richmond was the shelter afforded by the mountains to forces who, coming down the valleys of Virginia and the Shenandoah, forever turned the right of our armies and balked the advance upon the forces of the confederacy. You know that under the management of the aulic council that was directing the war from this capital how that valley was the weak spot that baffled all endeavor. Occupied with insufficient force and incompetent commanders, the generals we kept there were the most efficient commissaries of the confederate armies, and the troops who were periodically routed or captured furnished the other side with rations, ammunitions, and supplies, and with sufficient prisoners to counterbalance all our captures and make exchanges easy for the South. Even so late as 1864 this capital was almost captured, and Grant's army came near being withdrawn from the front in consequence of raids down these valleys and mountain passes. And when at last General Sheridan closed that road to Washington, and reluctant victory came to us on that ground, it was largely the cavalry that Pleasonton had drilled, equipped, and inspirited that made the scenes of Stonewall Jackson's fame the fields of Philip Sheridan's glory.

Mr. Chairman, I have seen Alfred Pleasonton at the head of 20,000 men, and I have seen him lying ill, sick with pneumonia, with scarce a servant to wait upon him or a fire to warm him. His proud spirit might object to my mention of his necessities here, but I know that he will attribute it to a heart that feels for him. I have known him in necessity and seen him in misery, and that, too, when the retired-list of the Army is bearing men who achieved their place through regular gradations in comfortable quarters and easy places, and who never heard the whistle of a hostile bullet or the boom of the enemy's cannon. And others are upon it who saw no service other than the volunteers, while this distinguished officer, who honored himself and the country for twenty-five of his best years, is denied a place upon it because he withdrew from the Army at a time when he thought injustice was done him.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] a while ago said that no injustice was done, that his relative rank was accorded, that Colonel Brackett, who preceded him upon the Army list before the war, maintained the same place only upon the reorganization. It may be so; but certainly Colonel Brackett did not achieve the great distinction, did not hold the high command, did not fill the great place in the public eye and the patriotic heart of the country that did Maj. Gen. Alfred Pleasonton, commander of the cavalry corps in the very height and crisis of the war.

We all know that there were jealousies and friendships, hates and admirations, that there were personal and sometimes political as well as just and patriotic considerations that much affected the standing and place of officers at the close of the war; that when the Army reorganization took place in 1868 these considerations prevailed in many instances, to the mortification of many eminent and deserving soldiers, to the loss of rank by some and its gain by others. Pleasonton conceived himself abused by that reorganization, and this may have led him to think that he could leave the road he had traveled from boyhood and to try to gain a living and a competency in unknown fields. It is true that his resignation is a legal bar to his taking his place on that retired-list where length of service and years of toil and danger would have given him the right to go. But I appeal to the House to consider the equities in this case, and to grant him that rank and place which, in view of his distinguished services, which are not questioned on this floor, he certainly deserves a place—a place among his old classmates and his war-worn comrades, and that he be provided by the Government he served so long, so faithfully, and so honorably with a sustenance for his declining years. [Applause.]

Mr. STOCKSLAGER was recognized.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will my colleague, before he proceeds, permit me to offer an amendment to this bill?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after the enacting clause and insert as follows: That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Alfred Pleasanton on the pension-rolls at the rate of $100 per month, the said pension to begin from and after the passage of this bill.

Mr. BAYNE. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will feel compelled to sustain the point of order, as it changes the whole character of the bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The effect is the same.

The CHAIRMAN. A bill to retire an officer is certainly different from a bill to pension one.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But you accomplish the same result.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has taken pains to examine the effect of the amendment with a view to what should be a proper ruling upon this point, and must adhere to the ruling already made.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania had better withdraw his point of order. That amendment may be adopted, but the bill in its present form I think can not.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, it is with great diffidence that I rise to oppose the measure before the committee, and which has received the sanction of the Committee on Military Affairs of this body. I regret also to be compelled to differ with my distinguished friend from California [General ROSECRANS]; but I believe that the principle involved in this case is a vicious one. I think the precedent which we would establish were we to place this gentleman upon the retired-list of the Army, taking him up from civil life for that purpose, and retiring him to a place which he voluntarily relinquished, would be simply to open the door not only, as my distinguished friend says, to a similar class, not to that class only who are equally distinguished as General Pleasonton, but every gentleman on this floor knows, for it is a well-recognized fact, that there is no body in the world, no court in the world, which quotes precedent as readily and adheres to it so strictly as this House of Representatives, and the moment you open the door, as proposed here, and take a man from the walks of civil life and place him upon the retired-list of the Army, because of distinguished services or for any other reason, the effect will be that you will find other men clamoring for the same thing; the precedents will be quoted, and you will be urged to put this, that, and the other upon the roll, and each one of them in his application will be supported by a precedent equally strong, until you will have individual after individual, class after class, each one perhaps a little less meritorious, until the time will not be far distant when you will find your civil pension-roll equal to if not greater than that of England herself.

Mr. Chairman, I am emphatically opposed to this whole principle of taking such cases and making special exceptions of them. Far be it from me to detract one single word from the eloquent statement of the distinguished services of General Pleasonton which my distinguished friend from Montana has just made. His services are known in the history of this country; they are known to every school-boy throughout the land; needed no encomium from the gentleman from Montana; and I am not here to detract a single laurel from the brow of General Pleasonton. But I am here, sir, in my own right as a Representative of the people, to oppose a principle which is involved, which I think is vicious, a principle that I believe to be wrong, a principle which is in direct violation of the practices of our Government from its foundation to the present time.

What are the facts in the case? Here is a gentleman who held a position in our Army, who voluntarily leaves it. Had he remained he would have been entitled to the great privileges which retired Army officers have, and I am not here to oppose them. It is probably right that they should have such privileges. I do not oppose the retired-list established for the benefit of those men who have been educated by the Government for its service in the Army and have served their country until they are no longer fit for service—worn out as it were in their country's service. But the complaint that men in the volunteer service do not get as much recognition as the retired officers of the regular Army receive may have some foundation, and there is no man who will go further toward granting liberal pensions to soldiers in any of our wars than I. But I repeat, what are the facts in this case? Here is an officer in the regular Army entitled to a claim upon the Government had he continued in the service; a regular appointee of the Government who voluntarily enters the walks of civil life. Now upon what ground are we asked to restore him? The only ground that is alleged for the restoration is the fact which we all admit of his distinguished services. It is not based on any other ground. It is not one of the cases which are sometimes brought before us where our whole sympathies are enlisted; where the man is in poverty and distress, or where we find the widow of a soldier is in suffering and want. No, Mr. Chairman; no such reason appears. But simply because of his distinguished services, or because of the suggestion of some other facts which go to show that he was not justly dealt with, we are asked to retire him at $4,000 per annum, a sum more than four times as great as we now pay to the poor soldier who has lost both his eyes in his country's service and is compelled to wander up and down the earth in total darkness.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I want to ask my young friend from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] one question. Does he think it is to the discredit of an officer of the Army that he has enterprise and energy enough to try to earn his living when the time has come that active service is not demanded? Ought that to be brought up against him to his disadvantage? Ought it not to be to his credit?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. It is not at all to his discredit, but it may be greatly to his credit. Still, when he voluntarily relinquished all the claims he had on the Government as an Army officer and voluntarily entered the walks of civil life, presumably that he might make more money or gain greater fame, I do not think he has any claim on the Government. If he was disabled in the war, if he was entitled to a pension, as my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] thinks he was, I would vote for that with great cheerfulness, if he came under the pension laws and was entitled to a pension.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I will say to my young friend from Indiana I had a particular reason for asking him the question I did. I did not resign from the Army because I expected to make more money. But I retired into private life honestly intending to earn my living instead of sticking to the Government and getting my living out of the Government. And I had some solicitude to know whether a young and intelligent and conscientious man like the gentleman from Indiana would look upon that as being to my discredit.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Not at all. If the gentleman from California had listened to me he would have heard me say it was not to his discredit, but was perhaps greatly to his credit. No man has a greater regard for my friend from California and for the commendable course pursued by him than I have. But as the gentleman has placed himself in the same category, let me say that the principle involved is precisely the same as if it was proposed to put my distinguished friend on the retired-list to-day. I do not believe he would ask it or have his friends ask it. Yet it is the same principle which is involved, the only difference being that General ROSECRANS, and also my gallant friend from New York, General SLOCUM, who stands in the same category, were perhaps both more distinguished officers in the service than General Pleasonton, and yet neither of these gentlemen, I believe, would permit his friends to ask what is asked here. But be that as it may, I object to this upon principle.

I will not yield to any gentleman in his encomiums of General Pleasonton and his gallant services. That is not what I am objecting to. I am objecting to the principle involved in this case of taking men from civil life and quartering them on the Government. We have bills pending before every appropriate committee in this House to-day proposing to take men from civil life and put them on the pension-list or the retired-list of the Army. I am unalterably opposed to that; and I hope gentlemen on this side of the House especially will set their face as a flint against it. The only precedents we have in this country for placing men on the civil pension-list have been established by the other side of the House. Never has such a precedent been established by the Democratic party, and I hope my friends on this side will never vote for anything of the kind.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If the view of the case stated by the gentleman from Indiana is to obtain, will it not be a discouragement for the officers of the Army to enter into civil life to obtain their own living? And as has been suggested by my friend from California [Mr. ROSECRANS], will it not be an encouragement for them to still retain their position in the Army and live at the expense of the Government?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I do not know whether it will or not; neither do I care. I shall not violate what I believe to be a true principle of legislation and a true position for our Government to take, whether it encourages or discourages men to leave the Army and give up their retired pay voluntarily. I say it does not make any difference to me whether they do or not. I think the principle is wrong, and the sooner we set our foot down squarely upon it so it shall go no further, the better, I take it, it will be for the people of the whole country.

Did I wish to detain the committee I might go on and enumerate all the instances we have in the history of the Government from its foundation to the present day where men have been taken from the walks of civil life and pensioned on the Government. The first case was in 1869; and in the last Congress we had three or four classes added to the civil pension-list of the country.

Mr. STEELE. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEELE. If we should pass this bill sanctioning the principle that officers of the Army after retiring into civil life may come back in ten or twelve years afterwards and be received in an advance grade, would it not encourage every officer of the Army to resign to-day expecting to be dealt with as this bill proposes to deal with General Pleasonton?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I think so; and that is a very good answer to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN]. I refer the question to him, but not to answer it in my time.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I can not answer the gentleman's question in my time, for I have not any time of my own.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I have said about all I intended to say on this subject. I want simply to emphasize my position on this whole system of placing officers on the retired-list of the Army. It is not because of opposition to the man or to the officer. I do not care whether it be Grant or Sherman or Slocum or Rosecrans or McClellan or any man who distinguished himself during the last war or in any preceding war, I will stand here and oppose any such thing. So long as I have a place on this floor I will not consent that any measure of this kind shall pass without emphasizing it with my opposition.

After yielding to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] such time as he may desire I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I want only five minutes.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I concur heartily in what has been said by my friend from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] concerning the propriety of the passage of this bill. If members who have been here for a number of terms will look back over the record they will see that it has been the persistent course of Congress not to increase the retired-list of the Army more than can be avoided, and never to encroach upon civil life to get persons to go upon it.

Let me call the attention of members of the House to the action of the Forty-sixth Congress and of the Forty-seventh Congress upon this subject, the former Democratic and the latter Republican. There is a distinguished citizen of the United States who held the chief position in its Army and who held the Chief Magistracy of the Republic for two terms. He left the Army in order to become a civilian, after the late war, having been educated at West Point. He came here and asked both of those Congresses to put him back into the Army in order that he might be placed on the retired-list. Has it been done? No. Even his distinguished services were not sufficient to cause Congress to turn back the strong and proper tide running in the direction of keeping civilians from applying for places on the retired-list.

Was this retired-list in existence when these officers entered the Military Academy? If I remember correctly the history of legislation on that subject, I answer no. What is its condition to-day? Since this discussion began I have collated the number of officers who were on the retired-list of the Army in July, 1883. While many have since been placed on it, I find that it then included six major-generals, twenty-three brigadier-generals, eighty-two colonels, twenty-nine lieutenant-colonels, fifty-five majors, one hundred and thirty-two captains, seventy-six first-lieutenants, thirteen second-lieutenants, and twelve chaplains. According to the legislation of Congress the time comes in the history of a man's life when he is too old to pray properly for the soldiers, and we have a retired-list for chaplains as well.

I insist that we shall adhere to proper precedents. Where is this thing to stop? You start a rivulet to-day, and twenty years hence it will be the Mississippi. How many are there on this floor who could go on the retired-list with the same or even with more propriety? My distinguished friend from California (Mr. ROSECRANS), whose services are known of all men; my friend from New York (Mr. SLOCUM), distinguished, and justly distinguished—but I need not take up the time of the committee in naming others. I know not what others may do, but I shall vote against this bill. I know how hard it is to resist measures which appeal to sympathy. I know, too, how magnificently charitable we often are when using the funds of others.

Many men have gone into private life who graduated at West Point. Some of them are in this Hall, some in the Senate. If we start the tide to-day, no man can tell when it will stop, or who can turn it back, or where the line can be drawn. Let us draw the line here and now. What is action to-day will be precedent to-morrow, and will be uniformly followed the next day. Precedents are dangerous. Let us not establish this evil one now.

Mr. BELFORD. I remember very well when during the last Congress the distinguished economist from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] desired to reduce the salaries of the members of this House. He thought they ought to be anywhere between $3,000 and $4,000 a year. Men who can earn more than the amount that is given to us by law are generally broad and liberal. The peanut, cheese-paring statesmen come from Indiana and from Tennessee. [Laughter.]

We have had in the history of this world fifteen decisive battles that have controlled the current of civilization. We had one in this country during the last conflict that was decisive of the whole controversy; that was the battle of Gettysburg. And I think to-day the loyal, educated, and intelligent people of the South thank God that the North won in that battle; that this is one country, majestic in its honor, immeasurable in its power, and almost infinite in its resources.

In almost every battle of note in the history of our war General Pleasonton used his sword to make this nation one, undivided, and forever inseparable. I would vote to give him a pension for life as cheerfully as I would vote to give General ROSECRANS, that honorable and magnificent soldier, a bounty during his life.

Gentlemen, let us be generous, not only with regard to the soldiers who led the Union army, but I will say—and probably the press will condemn me for it—the soldiers possibly who led the Southern army. This is our whole country. We are united to-day. We are all one, and not two.

When we come to put General Pleasonton on the retired-list and give him a reasonable compensation for the valuable services he has rendered the country, do not let us put ourselves into any partisan attitude. Let us reward those at least who have struggled year after year to save our country. Let us reward those who have enabled us on both sides of this House, without regard to the late unpleasantness, to enjoy the privileges of the Constitution. Let us blend the red rose of the South with the white rose of the North. Let us unite forever and forever the families of York and of Lancaster, and make this the grandest republic that has appeared in the annals of time.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] says that the principle involved in this bill is a vicious one. What is that principle? It is that where a soldier is worn out in the service of his country, disabled by wounds received or disease incurred in the line of duty, and unable to provide for himself, the Government shall then take care of him and not leave him to the cold charity of the world. That is the principle asserted in this bill. It has nothing whatever to do with the creation of a civil pension-list. The bill proposes to allow Col. Alfred Pleasonton to be appointed by the President to the Army from which he resigned after the war was over and placed upon the retired-list. It is in evidence before the committee that he is an old man, sick, and in broken health, and destitute of the common necessities of life. Surely, under such conditions, an able and patriotic soldier, who has devoted his best years to the military service and who has won distinction upon many hard-fought battlefields, is entitled to favorable consideration at the hands of his country.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] wants to know where this thing shall stop. I hope it never will stop. I trust that as long as we have a government it will not fail to provide for an old and disabled soldier who has worn himself out in its service, and who is by reason of infirmities incident to age or disabilities incurred in the discharge of his duty unable longer to provide for himself.

The gentleman refers to the case of General Grant. I will say this: if General Grant should ever come before the American Congress asking to be placed on the retired-list of the Army because he is unable to take care of himself this Government would be disgraced if it refused to promptly comply with such a request. [Applause.] I for one shall be ready to vote, when that time comes, to place him on the retired-list. But his case at present is an entirely different one, as are those of the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM]. Admitting their distinguished service, they are amply able to provide for themselves, and do not require the assistance of the Government.

The principle upon which this bill rests is as old as the Government itself. You can not organize a respectable army of good material unless you make it the policy of the Government that when your soldiers are worn out, disabled by wounds or disease—when the infirmities of age come upon them, as in the case of Alfred Pleasonton; when they are suffering from impaired health incident to the hardships of their military life; when they are unable longer to take care of themselves—the Government shall step in and provide for them. That is the policy of the Government; and it is a just one.

The only question remaining is whether Alfred Pleasonton by resigning his commission in the Army has placed himself beyond the reach of this wise and humane policy. I think not. I think it was entirely to his credit that he retired from the Army. Whether he resigned to enter the civil service or to engage in business pursuits in a time of peace, it was a commendable act.

We find here a man who has served his country for a quarter of a century, who is now infirm, suffering from disease contracted in the military service, unable to provide for himself; and I say, considering his great services, especially in the last war, it would be a disgrace to the American Congress to refuse to pass this bill and provide for his declining years.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this bill must rest upon one of three grounds: need, or disability incurred in the service, or reward for services. If it is placed on the ground stated by the gentleman last on the floor [Mr. MORGAN], which is that General Pleasonton is not able to take care of himself, it comes before us as a case of need—the case of a distinguished officer unable to provide for himself. Placed upon that ground, it is a case of charity and nothing else.

If this claim rests upon the ground of disability incurred by General Pleasonton in the service in the line of duty, then it rests upon a ground that we can consider.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I wish to say to my friend from Ohio that the bill rests upon both those grounds.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If General Pleasonton has sustained disability in the military service by wound or otherwise, then undoubtedly he is entitled, under existing laws, to compensation for that disability.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But the report does not say that he is suffering from disability of that kind.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If he has been in any way disabled in the military service, then I say he is entitled to compensation for that disability. And I maintain that pensions proper have no other ground upon which they can be supported for a moment. There is no ground for a pension but disability incurred in the line of duty in the military service. No government in the world but ours has ever pensioned persons who have been in the military service upon any other ground than disability, and in only two instances has our Government departed from this principle, and these I hold to be bad precedents.

If this claim rests upon the third ground, that of a reward for meritorious and distinguished services, that is another thing. I could support a claim on that basis if I were satisfied that the claim had such exceptional merit as to justify us in voting for it upon that ground. And it is true that General Pleasonton has performed meritorious and distinguished services. I very cheerfully and gladly give him credit for brave and gallant services during the late war. But others—hundreds and thousands of others—performed meritorious and gallant services for which they must be content with the compensation which the Government by law has provided. Beyond that they must look for their reward in other directions, and I believe the highest reward General Pleasonton can hope for is the place he has made for himself in history, of which he and his country may well be proud.

But that is one thing, and it is quite another to come here and ask to be singled out, and especially rewarded in money for distinguished services, when there are hundreds and thousands who can lay claim to rewards on the same grounds, to say nothing of disabilities they have sustained besides. These others, I say, must all be content with what the law has provided as the money consideration for such services. What was this compensation in the case of General Pleasonton? First, his pay as an officer in the regular Army during all the time he served in that capacity, and then his pay as major-general of volunteers during a number of years; and had he remained in the regular Army he would have been entitled when he reached the prescribed age to go on the retired-list. Now, it may be a little hard that General Pleasonton's act of resignation should deprive him of his right to go upon the retired-list, but no harder in his than in some other cases, and it was his own act. It was his choice; and it seems to me when he makes the choice himself he must be concluded by it, although subsequently he may wish to reconsider, and if possible to reverse his previous action.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to single out General Pleasonton from all other claimants for bounty, and by an act ex gratia speciali rewarding him alone, we thereby set not only a bad precedent, but do injustice to others by making this distinction.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. MAGINNIS. How many are there whose cases are like that of General Pleasonton?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Perhaps not many exactly like it, but many who would make this case a precedent for claims for services for which they had not been adequately compensated. Such claims are constantly coming here on every conceivable plea, and by passing this bill we will not only establish a bad precedent, but we are undertaking to do what I think ought not to be done.

Mr. MAGINNIS. How many are there who stand in the same relation with General Pleasonton?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not know. I could not name them now.

Mr. MAGINNIS. You can not name half a dozen.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Wherein does his case differ from that of many others?

Mr. ROSECRANS. It is because they have not the record of General Pleasonton.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think there are many who stand in a position to ask us with as much show of right to be placed on the retired-list as General Pleasonton; not perhaps with the same rank, but as colonels, majors, captains, or lieutenants. There are now before committees bills asking the House to open the door so as to admit all volunteer officers who were discharged on account of wounds to the retired-list. They ask to be taken from the pension-roll and put on the retired-list, and on the same footing with officers of the regular Army. They claim it not only for meritorious services, but for wounds also. There is, in my judgment, as much merit in the one case as in the other. In the regular service it is true the law provides for the retirement of officers after a given length of service. It may be held that those serving in the regular Army serve under a contract with the Government under which they are entitled to a certain amount of pay a year as salary, and after a specified number of years or when they reach a given age that they may go onto the retired-list at another given rate of pay, and that the whole constitutes their life-pay as officers of the Army.

I concede to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] the correctness of his position, that there is the difference he makes under the law between the regular Army and volunteers. But we are not acting here under that law. General Pleasonton chose himself to take another position, and he voluntarily placed himself in the category of those who had served as volunteers in the Army. He now comes here and asks compensation for gallant and distinguished services, not under the law under which he might have gone onto the retired-list, but outside of that law. And I repeat that if special reward is given to him in this way, there are thousands who served in the war with him who may come here on the same plea and say they too had not been adequately compensated for the services they had rendered their country in time of need. And that might all be true; but we can not go back over all the years of the war and single out individual cases, and undertake to readjust the inequalities and right the wrongs that war produces. And we ought not, in my judgment, to single out one case to the exclusion of others.

The retired-list of the Army I think is already too large. Officers of the Army are permitted to go upon it at too early an age. It has grown to be too large, and I do not think it safe to open the door still wider and permit those to go upon it not entitled under the law to go there. I should much rather myself vote to more rigidly limit and restrict the retired-list and the conditions under which officers can get there than to enlarge the roll already so overgrown.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Before the gentleman takes his seat I wish to ask him a question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I do not desire to go into any personal argument, but in view of the fact stated by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] that the Forty-sixth Congress refused to put General Grant on the retired-list, I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he and others on this side did not vote to place General Shields upon the retired-list, who never had been any other than a volunteer officer.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I was not in Congress when that question was up.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I will tell the gentleman this, that a Democratic Congress by a large majority voted to put General Shields upon the retired-list.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let me say a word further. If in some other way the distinguished services of General Pleasonton could be recognized and fully rewarded I should be glad to favor it, but I am opposed to establishing this precedent, the effect of which or the tendency of which will be to open the retired-list as a reward or place of reward for meritorious services, and to such a list there would be no end. We must not confound service and disability. It is not safe to go outside of the law to compensate services. It is opening too wide a door to do that, and I believe we should restrict pensions to disability incurred in the service in the line of duty. Service and disability are separate and distinct grounds for claims. Pay for service is not a pension. Pension is compensation for disability, and ought not to be granted as reward for services.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I rise, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of offering an amendment to this bill.

I move to strike out, in lines 11 and 12, the words "brigadier-general" and insert in lieu thereof the word "colonel."

This will give to General Pleasonton the same rank and grade that he would be now entitled to hold if he had remained in the service of the country up to the present time. It does away with the objection of some gentlemen upon the floor that General Pleasonton is to gain by having retired from the service and gone into private life.

The CHAIRMAN. In order that there may be no misapprehension, the Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan that the words "brigadier-general" do not appear in the bill. There is such an amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Then I offer the amendment I have suggested as an amendment to the one proposed by the committee.

It seems to me, sir, that the objection to retiring General Pleasonton with the rank of brigadier-general is a well-founded objection, for the reason that if he had continued in the service of the country until now, as appears from the Army Register, he would not have reached that grade.

The simple question before us to consider, then, as presented by this bill, is whether or not the fact that an officer has retired from the military service voluntarily, has for a term of years attempted to gain a livelihood by civil pursuits, shall debar him utterly and completely from future recognition? It seems to me that just here we ought to make a discrimination between officers of the regular military establishment and officers of the volunteer army. The officer of volunteers goes to the succor of his country in a great emergency. He understands that the employment for which his services are needed is to be but a temporary one, and that when the few months or years for which he enlisted shall pass he is again to return to the pursuits of civil life. On the contrary, the officer of the regular Army who enters the service of the country from the Military Academy enters it with the distinct understanding that he enters upon a life duty. He not only has spent years in preparing, equipping himself for the service, but by his very preparation and by his subsequent military life he utterly unfits himself for any kind of private pursuits or walks in life which might otherwise be open to him. This is a fact that is well recognized. I believe it is a fact of almost universal observation and recognition that those who have served in the regular Army in any grade for a term of years never thereafter succeed in the pursuits of civil life.

General Pleasonton graduated from the Military Academy in 1844. He continued in the service of his country from that time throughout the terrible struggle of our civil war, and when the piping times of peace again returned, when he found his services as an officer were no longer actually required by the country, he desired to be no longer a burden upon the country or a burden upon the pay-rolls, and made an honest effort in the pursuits of civil life to gain his own livelihood. But by a service of twenty-four years, after a quarter of a century of service in the military establishment, he had disqualified himself to a great extent for success in business pursuits. His efforts in that direction failed.

The simple question before us is, shall this gallant officer, because nobody disputes his gallantry—shall this distinguished officer, for nobody controverts his title to distinction—shall this man, who bore his full part according to his great ability in the military grade for the support and sustenance of his country, be in a worse situation because he voluntarily for a time attempted to assume his own support than if he had remained in the service of the country during all these years and drawn his salary from the Treasury of the Government?

For myself I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am prepared to take the responsibility of voting for this bill as amended in the manner I propose. I am not afraid of that vote. I am not afraid for one to single out this case, if need be (this is the first case we have reached)—I am not afraid to single this out and put this distinguished officer back on the rolls, doing thereby an act of simple justice to him; and then when we reach the next bill to consider that also on its merits.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a single word as to the question of national policy. No nation of this world has ever succeeded in existing for any considerable length of time, in maintaining its rank among the nations of the earth, that did not have and maintain a regularly equipped military establishment. I presume that until the millennium comes it will be necessary for the nations of the world to maintain standing armies. I apprehend that that time is not yet, and that it never will come when this nation will be without the need of a regular army. Then, as a matter of public policy, as a matter of national justice, when we invite bright young men to enter the Military Academy, to step from thence into the ranks of the Army to serve their entire lives in the service of their country, shall we give them to understand that in that service, after twenty-five years, they shall return to the walks of civil life and be of interest to the Government no further? General Pleasonton, with his distinguished services in his young and ripe manhood, returned voluntarily to the walks of civil life. Shall he thereby be debarred for that reason from the fostering care and protection of the Government that he served so long, served so well, and served with so much distinction? For my part, Mr. Chairman, I am ready now to vote for this bill with the insertion of the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. STEELE. I only wish to make one or two remarks. In the first place, I desire to send up a proviso or amendment to the bill, in order that it may be pending.

It is said that this man did not make any money during the war. How many men in this country are suffering from total disability incurred during the war and are utterly unable to take care of themselves to-day? Talk about the understanding! If any man in proposing to enter the Army had understood he was to have both legs or both arms shot off do you suppose he would have gone?

I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. If that motion is not now in order, I desire that the amendment which I send to the desk be considered as pending. I move that the committee rise and report the bill with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. BAYNE. I make the point of order that the motions to rise and to strike out the enacting clause can not be made as one motion.

Mr. STEELE. Then I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BAYNE. I submit that that motion can not be entertained until the bill is before the committee for consideration under the five-minute rule. We are now engaged in the general debate. If the gentleman from Indiana will have patience I propose to move that the committee rise for the purpose of obtaining an order from the House to limit general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. When the first section of the bill is reached the motion to strike out the enacting clause will be in order.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the committee rise, my object being to obtain an order from the House to limit debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1101) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton a major-general, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the Private Calendar. Pending that motion I move that all general debate on the pending bill be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to know if it is in order now to move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill is not now in the House. It is in Committee of the Whole.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BAYNE to limit general debate to ten minutes, it was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House, in Committee of the Whole, resumes consideration of the bill (H. R. 1101) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton a major-general. By order of the House all general debate on the bill is limited to ten minutes.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. This is a bill to give a salary of about $4,000 to a man who is confessedly a failure as a business man. The gentleman having this bill in charge states that this gentleman, gallant officer as he was during the war, has no business qualifications. Now, sir, if that be true, that the gentleman has no business qualifications, it seems to me that the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS], with his West Point associations and kindly relations to this gentleman whose bill we are now considering, ought to revolve this question in his mind, whether the argument he makes in favor of General Pleasonton does not lie against an appropriation when the appropriation bill for the Military Academy at West Point comes up? A man who has been educated at the nation's expense, who has rendered distinguished service in time of war, and a few years ago was the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in control of that department which collects immense sums of money from the people to defray the expenses of this nation—to tell us that we must put such a man on the retired-list four files beyond the position which he held when he retired from the service on his motion—that we must give that man, not as a common pensioner, but on account of distinguished service—that we must give that man who has no business qualifications $4,000 a year as a retired officer—I desire to say I do not believe that the people of this country will sanction any such action, whether we do it under an impulse of generosity or whether we do it, as was done a few weeks ago, by correcting the record of men during the late war. A few weeks ago we undertook to set right General Fitz-John Porter, to give him honor, to give him rank that by his traitorous conduct he was not entitled to, and which will in a short while, perhaps in the next session of Congress if not in this, be made to entitle him to back pay of nearly $400,000.

Now the Democratic side of the House, controlled by a majority of ex-confederates in the late war, proposes to rectify the mistakes and shortcomings during the late war; and this bill is reported by a committee of the Democratic House controlled as I have said.

Mr. KING. The majority of Democrats in this House are from the North.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I stand I think on the record when I say, although that is a digression, that the majority of the Democratic side of this House were not only sympathizers but active participants on the wrong side in the late unpleasantness.

Mr. KING. You are mistaken. The majority of Democrats in this House are from the North; and the majority of the men who fought on the Northern side during the war were Democrats, led by Grant, who was a Democrat; by Sherman, who, I understand, was a Democrat; by McClellan, who was a Democrat; by Logan, who was a Democrat.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If it is not true that the majority of the Democratic side are ex-confederates, the numbers of that side are swelled by the deserters from the Republican side.

The distinguished gentleman from California says that he has reason to know some of the causes of Pleasonton's not being duly promoted. He did not tell us what those causes were. Perhaps in some future Congress a bill will be introduced here to give the gentleman from California rank four files in advance of that to which he was entitled in the late war, because some one who may then perchance be on the floor will know of some of the causes why he was not properly promoted during the late war.

It is another instance of West Point jealousy, and the associations which gather around West Point, and make these men feel a lovely interest in each others bills when they come before Congress. But those of us who represent the rural districts, who live in remote localities, can only look at this matter as we do at others. Is it right, I say, when you come to square it with the records of the poor private soldiers, who have lost limbs, who have lost sight, who have lost health in the service of their country, who have been poor all their lives, who were poor before the war, who left their families on sufferance during the war and who have been almost paupers since the war—when you propose to take this distinguished man and give him $4,000 a year while there are hundreds and thousands of that nobler and better class—though not quite so distinguished—and more patriotic class who are getting nothing for their services?

The gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] says he proposes to place a mark of distinction on Alfred Pleasonton. I desire to say that if the record made by Alfred Pleasonton during the late war does not place a mark of distinction upon him, it does not lie in the power of any man on that side of the House, or in the power of the whole majority on that side, or the majority of the whole House, to place a mark of distinction upon him at this late day.

Of his own free motion he retired from the Army to take his place among the rest of us in civil life and to battle for a living among the people of this nation. In that the gentleman from California says he has proved a failure, that he has no business qualifications. I say, if these things be true we ought to give him a pension, but we ought not to pass this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate upon the bill is closed. The bill will now be read for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the laws regulating appointments in the Army be, and they are hereby, suspended, and suspended only for the purposes of this act; and the President is hereby authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Alfred Pleasonton, of New York, late a major-general of volunteers in the Army of the United States, brevet major-general in the Army of the United States, and thereupon to place him, the said Alfred Pleasonton, upon the retired-list of the Army as such major-general, without regard and in addition to the number now authorized by law of said retired-list.

The amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs was to strike out, in line 11, the words "such major-general" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "a brigadier-general."

Mr. STEELE. I ask now to have read the proviso which I indicated a purpose to offer, in order that it may be considered as pending.

Mr. BAYNE. I understand that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] moved an amendment to the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The amendment of Mr. CUTCHEON was to strike out "brigadier-general" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "colonel."

Mr. STEELE. Is it in order now to have read the proviso which I desire to have pending?

Mr. BAYNE. It is not now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is already pending an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STEELE. I ask to have my amendment read and considered as pending.

Mr. BAYNE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments now pending.

Mr. STEELE. This is a proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in the nature of an amendment. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is no government on the face of this earth that is as ungenerous, miserly, parsimonious, and stingy to the men who have defended it as this American Republic. Its conduct justifies the expression that "republics are ungrateful." When Wellington conducted his masterly campaign in Spain and afterward won the wondrous battle of Waterloo he was made a duke of England and invested with a magnificent estate. When Ney fought the gallant battles in Italy he was made marshal and enriched out of the funds of the French Empire. Yet here we are to-day standing in the corruscating blaze of national victories, with a Treasury plethoric with one hundred and fifty millions of surplus revenue, and refusing to do justice to a gallant soldier of the Republic. Can we not recognize his great services by some financial act? I hold that when a man has faithfully served his country we should treat him as the British Government treats those in its service. When Wolseley went forth to Egypt, conquered that country, and came back, England made him a peer of the realm, just as it had made Wellington a duke at an earlier period. You may talk about the peerage of the immortals, but I do declare that in my judgment men who have served their country should be treated by us with the same respect and generosity with which they are treated in a monarchical government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HANBACK. Mr. Chairman, I favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], and shall with great pleasure vote for the bill as thus amended because of the gallant services of General Pleasonton. I believe that it is the duty of the country to take care of the men who preserved that country. I know as well as any man here knows—no better—the dependence of the rank and file on the men who led the legions of the Union in the late war. Consequently in my belief it is just and right that this man, who spent the best years of his life in the service of his country, should receive this recognition at the hands of the Government. I hope the amendment proposing to retire him with the rank of colonel will be accepted by the other side, as I know there are numbers on this side who will vote for it.

I see before me upon the other side of this House a man under whose guidance I marched and fought for many a day. We loved him as our leader; and of that grand Army of the Cumberland, scattered to-day all over the country, there is not one man whose heart does not glow and whose eye does not brighten at the mention of the name "Old Rosy." If ever the time should come to extend to him such a recognition as is now proposed in this bill for General Pleasonton, I should vote for it most willingly. I believe that General Pleasonton justly deserves from his country to be placed upon the retired-list with the rank of colonel.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Does the gentleman advocate this proposition upon the ground that General Pleasonton held the rank and drew the pay of colonel at the time of his resignation?

Mr. HANBACK. No, sir; I advocate it with the understanding that he deserved that rank, and if he had remained in the service would have succeeded to it. More than that, he gave the best years of his life to the service of his country, and even if he would not have reached this rank, I am in favor of extending it to him so that he may be retired as a colonel.

Mr. STEELE. Would the gentleman be willing to put our soldiers, who gave more than their lives to their country, upon an equal footing with General Pleasonton?

Mr. HANBACK. I am for pensioning every soldier of the Union—every one of them according to his rank.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman vote to put upon the retired-list as a brigadier-general every soldier suffering from total disability incurred in the line of duty during the late war?

Mr. HANBACK. Whenever the gentleman introduces a bill——

Mr. STEELE. I have offered such an amendment to this bill.

Mr. HANBACK. Whenever the gentleman introduces a bill to pension every soldier who bore honorable service for the country in the late war I will vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move to amend by striking out the last clause of the bill: "without regard and in addition to the number now authorized by law of said retired-list."

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments pending. The gentleman himself has offered an amendment to the pending amendment.

Mr. BAYNE. I rise to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. Two speeches have been made.

Mr. BAYNE. I move as a substitute to strike out the last word.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is not debate on the bill and amendments exhausted by limitation of time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so holds.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then I raise the point of order that these formal amendments are out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BAYNE. But a substitute is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. An informal amendment is not in order.

Mr. BAYNE. I offer my amendment as a substitute. I do it for the purpose of hastening a conclusion on this bill. I hope nobody will object.

Mr. HAMMOND. I insist on my point of order that debate is exhausted by limitation of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so decided. There are two amendments pending. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out "brigadier-general," in the eleventh and twelfth lines, and inserting "colonel."

Mr. BAYNE. As I understand, the gentleman from Michigan withdraws that amendment.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to withdraw it for the time being in order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] may renew it.

Mr. BAYNE. I renew the amendment.

Mr. STEELE. Can that be done except by unanimous consent?

Mr. BAYNE. Oh, yes.

Mr. HAMMOND. I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that if the point be raised the amendment can not be withdrawn without unanimous consent.

Mr. BAYNE. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman that proposes an amendment has the right to withdraw it; has he not?

Mr. STEELE. Not except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAYNE. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will have an opportunity in a moment.

Mr. BAYNE. The importance of what I wish to say comes in here.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to say that I hope all who are disposed to relieve General Pleasonton to the extent of that amendment will vote for it. In other words, I am admonished and advised by gentlemen——

Mr. STEELE. I call the gentleman from Pennsylvania to order.

Mr. BAYNE. I am advised and admonished by those who have an earnest and active sympathy for this man and who do not regard the snobbery of the Army in preference to doing justice to a gallant soldier of this country, who has earned more laurels than all those who are opposing him on this floor——

Mr. STEELE. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will come to order.

Mr. BAYNE. I am in order. I am speaking to the amendment.

Mr. STEELE. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already decided an amendment could not be withdrawn in Committee of the Whole House except by unanimous consent, and objection is made.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish merely to say that I want all friends of the bill to vote for the amendment to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON]. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have the rule read. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XXIII.

5. * * * Neither an amendment nor an amendment to an amendment shall be withdrawn by the mover thereof unless by the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. BAYNE. I was in error about that. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Michigan, which the Clerk will read.

The amendment to the amendment was read.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I hope I will have unanimous consent to state what the effect of the amendment will be.

Mr. STEELE. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is not in order.

Mr. EATON. Has discussion on the amendment been exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. EATON. Then I hope the amendment will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUTCHEON'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment of the committee as amended was then adopted.

Mr. STEELE. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion until I can make an amendment to perfect the title. I wish to make it correspond to the amendment just adopted.

Mr. STEELE. Let us first vote on the motion to strike out the enacting clause; then if the enacting clause be not stricken out I will move a proviso to be added to the end of the bill. I demand tellers on the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BAYNE and Mr. STEELE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 102.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. STEELE. I now move to add the following proviso.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That all soldiers of the war for the suppression of the rebellion who are suffering total disability resulting from wounds received in the line of duty shall also be placed on the retired-list of the Army as brigadier-generals.

Mr. BAYNE. I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to speak to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. STEELE. I can not see, Mr. Chairman, why it is not in order, if we can take a man from the civil list and give him two or three promotions who resigned from the Army in a perfectly healthy condition, so much so that he was appointed as Internal Revenue Commissioner in 1874 and 1875—[cries of "Order!"]—why is it not just as much in order to take also from the civil list men who have lost arms and legs and put them on an equal footing with him?

Mr. BAYNE. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. STEELE. What is it?

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman is not speaking to his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pensylvania, and he also sustains the point of order against the amendment that it changes the entire object of the bill in favor of a private individual to a general bill referring to a class.

Mr. BAYNE. I move now that the title of the bill be amended so as to correspond to the amendment which has already been adopted.

Mr. STEELE. Would it be in order to have my gallant friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] who sits here, and who lost a leg in battle, included under the provisions of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania is on the floor proposing an amendment.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the title of the bill be amended by striking out the words "major-general" and inserting the word "colonel."

Mr. STEELE. I insist upon my parlimentary inquiry. I ask whether it would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will be answered in due time. The Chair will now state to him that he can not take the gentleman from Pennsylvania off the floor for that sort of a suggestion. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the words "major-general" be stricken from the title and that the word "colonel" be substitued, so as to conform to the action of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 1199) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes,' approved June 20, 1878."

GENERAL ALFRED PLEASONTON.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a motion to correct the title.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the words "major-general" be stricken out from the title of the bill and the word "colonel" be substituted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the bill be laid aside and reported favorably to the House with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, was there not a motion that the committee rise? I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. STEELE. Undoubtedly the gentleman meant that, but I understood him to move that the committee rise for that purpose.

Mr. BAYNE. I did not make that motion.

LOUISA BODDY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1292) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa Boddy, of Oregon.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Louisa Boddy, of —— County, State of Oregon, the sum of $6,180, in full settlement of her claim against the Government for depredations committed and property taken and destroyed by the Modoc Indians on or about November 29, 1872.

The committee recommend the following amendment: In lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "$6,180" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,400."

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the report should be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before that I would like to inquire whether these reports are printed? I have sent to the document-room and find it is not to be had.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the report is printed. Every report is printed under the rules of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it very important that gentlemen should obtain the reports on which they are called to act. I sent a few moments ago to the document-room, but could find none there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that under the rules every one of these reports is sent by mail to members.

Mr. HOLMAN. But still there are reports found in the document-room subject to the call of members of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that they are held in the document-room as a part of the files of the House, and not for distribution.

The Clerk will resume the reading of the report.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report. It is as follows:

This claim, as herein reported, was before the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, and by them thoroughly examined and reported with the unanimous recommendation that it pass. It was also before the House Committee on Indian Affairs of the last Congress, considered in the same manner, and unanimously reported with a favorable recommendation. This bill also passed the Senate during said session, but it did not reach a vote in the House. This committee has had before it, in addition to the former papers and evidence presented, lengthy petitions from the settlers residing in the vicinity of Lost River, in the State of Oregon, petitioning Congress for the passage of this bill. Said petition is signed by many leading citizens of that State.

This case appears to be one of peculiar hardship, requiring special consideration from Congress. It differs from the vast body of claims growing out of Indian depredations. Mainly through negligence and carelessness manifested by the military and other authorities of the United States at the time of this outbreak Mrs. Boddy was caused to suffer the loss of her husband, two sons, and a son-in-law, and the most of her property, and was driven into the woods and mountains, and subjected to great physical suffering. Her claim has been approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and reported to Congress with a favorable recommendation for an appropriation. The facts were fully detailed in a report made by Hon. Mr. Deering, of Iowa, from the House Committee on Indian Affairs, in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Your committee, after carefully investigating the evidence presented, have found it as stated in said report, and recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the following words: "Six thousand one hundred and eighty dollars" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "five thousand and four hundred dollars," so that the amount will conform to the finding of the Interior Department, and as amended recommend the passage of the bill.

The former House report is as follows:

[House Report No. 1896, Forty-seventh Congress, second session.]

Mr. Deering, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report to accompany bill H. R. 5131:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5131) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa Boddy, of Oregon, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

This claim was before the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, who, after examining thoroughly, reported the same back with unanimous recommendation that it pass.

Your committee, after carefully investigating and examining the facts and evidence presented, have found them as stated in the Senate report No. 650, have adopted said report, and recommend the passage of the bill. The Senate report is as follows:

It appears by the petition of Mrs. Louisa Boddy that her husband, together with a son-in-law and one grown son, became settlers upon the public lands of the United States, in the valley of Lost River, in Lake County, Oregon, some four months prior to the commencement of the late Modoc Indian war, which said war began November 29, 1872, and terminated in June, 1873. Long prior to said settlement the Indian title to said lands had been extinguished by a treaty with the Klamath, Modoc, and other Indians, which said treaty was signed October 14, 1864, and ratified by the United States Senate July 2, 1866. Said lands were afterward surveyed by the United States and opened to settlement in 1869.

On the 6th of August, 1872, the Boddy family, consisting of the husband of the petitioner, her son-in-law Nicholas Schira, and wife, who was the daughter of the petitioner, and her two sons, one a minor, made settlement on said lands.

On the 29th of November, 1872, the Government undertook, with an inadequate military force, consisting of James Jackson, First United States Cavalry, and thirty-five men, to remove by force the Modoc Indians from said public lands, where they had been roaming contrary to the injunctions of the Indian agent having charge of them, to the Klamath reservation. Such an insignificant force could not and did not have any effect to intimidate these Indians. The result was that Indian hostilities were at once precipitated, and a most cruel slaughter was immediately commenced by those Indians upon the unoffending and unsuspecting settlers of Lost River Valley, which slaughter began immediately after the attack upon Captain Jack's camp by Lieutenant Jackson on the morning of November 29, 1872, at early light. Among those who were massacred were the husband of the petitioner, her two sons, and her son-in-law, who were peaceably pursuing their usual vocations.

The petitioner further states in a graphic manner her discovery of the lifeless forms of her husband and sons, stripped and mutilated, and how, struck with fear, she and her daughter fled at once to the neighboring mountains, where, without food or shelter, and thinly clad, with snow on the ground, they remained for two days before daring to make their way to any friendly shelter.

After the massacre the Indians destroyed and carried off all the personal property of the families, embracing horses, sheep, hogs, cattle, poultry, clothing, provisions, &c., and also including $829 in gold and silver coin, and burned the houses. The mutilated bodies of those who were killed were afterward recovered and buried at Linkville by the Oregon Volunteers.

By this disaster the petitioner was reduced at once from a condition of comparative affluence to one of poverty and wretchedness.

The petitioner duly presented her claim for property thus stolen and destroyed, amounting to $6,180, in due form to the Indian Bureau, and placed a duplicate copy thereof in the hands of the local Indian agent. No relief, however, of any kind has ever been received by her. She therefore appeals to Congress.

This petition is sustained by the names of one hundred substantial citizens of Oregon and residents of Lake County and vicinity, including Jesse Applegate, one of the Modoc peace commissioners; L. S. Dyar, Indian agent at the time of the massacre; J. H. Rook, Indian agent at the time of signing the petition; S. B. Cranston, register of the United States land office, and Quincy A. Brooks, assistant quartermaster-general of Oregon Volunteers, who certify "that the facts set forth in said petition are correct and true."

In forwarding to the Indian Department the claim of Mrs. Boddy for depredations committed by the Modoc Indians, as before stated, the local Indian agent, Mr. Dyar, wrote as follows to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs:

KLAMATH AGENCY, OREGON, April 24, 1876.

SIR: I inclose herewith papers relating to claims of Mrs. Louisa Boddy and Mrs. Kate Nurse, for depredations committed by the Modoc Indians.

I have examined them, and find that the prices charged for hay, flour, groceries, and sheep are not above the ruling rates at the time and place of the depredations. I am knowing to the fact that these claimants were great sufferers from the Modocs; that their husbands and other members of their families were murdered, and much of their property destroyed by these Indians.

I am unable to present the case to the Indians, as required in article 4 of Rules and Regulations of the Department relative to such claims, as the perpetrators are now located upon the Quapaw reservation in the Indian Territory.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. S. DYAR,
United States Indian Agent.

Hon. J. Q. SMITH,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

In addition to the foregoing are affidavits of four disinterested citizens, Mr. Hartery, John Fritz, Dan. Calwell, and W. S. Bybee, who were the nearest neighbors to the Boddy settlement, who testified to the amount and character of the property destroyed as near as the circumstances of the case would admit. Mrs. Boddy's own affidavit, made in this city during the present session of Congress, also gives further particulars and satisfactory account of all the circumstances of her losses.

In view of the premises, and in consideration of the whole case, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, on request of the Secretary of the Interior, communicated, under date of March 10, 1882, the following letter, which has been submitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs, to wit:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, March 10, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to be in receipt, by Department's reference for report, of a petition (herewith inclosed) to Congress by Mrs. Louisa Boddy, of Lake County, Oregon, praying for compensation for losses and injuries inflicted by Modoc Indians in November, 1872. A duplicate of this petition, together with other papers in the case (some of which had before been in this office, and were submitted to the Department June 12, 1876, for transmittal to Congress), were also filed in this office yesterday by J. F. Kinney, attorney for Mrs. Boddy. These papers are also herewith inclosed. Among them is a copy of the report of this office, above referred to, of June 12, 1876, upon the claim of Mrs. Boddy, which had been filed in this office for preliminary examination under the laws and departmental regulations governing the settlement of Indian depredation claims, and, as will be seen, upon the papers then before one of my predecessors, he arrived at the following conclusion:

"There is, therefore, no doubt as to the fact of the depredation, but there is no reliable evidence in the case to show the extent of it or the amount and value of the property lost. I can not, therefore, do otherwise than recommend a disallowance of the claim. The depredation was committed in November, 1872, and the claim was not presented for adjustment until April last [1876], and is therefore barred."

By reference to the declaration and proofs of the claimant upon which my predecessors acted (see papers marked A, herewith) it will be seen that four witnesses to the depredation were M. Hartery, John Fritz, Dan. Calwell, and W. S. Bybee, who could not swear that they knew of their own personal knowledge that the identical property enumerated in the schedule sworn to by Mrs. Boddy was the property destroyed by the Modocs, but they swear they were neighbors of William Boddy, deceased, and know that "valuable property belonging to said affiant (Louisa Boddy) was destroyed, injured, or taken away" by the hostile Modocs, and that "they believe the foregoing statement of articles destroyed, injured, or taken away by said Indians, together with the value thereof, and of each and every item of said account, as set forth in the foregoing affidavit (the affidavit of Mrs. Boddy), to be correct and true."

Their inability to swear with more particularity and the impracticability of obtaining more specific evidence are explained by the petition of Mrs. Boddy to Congress, and by her affidavit, dated 5th instant in this city, which, of course, were not before my predecessor when he acted on the case. Particular attention is invited to these. They show that the husband of Mrs. Boddy, her two sons, aged respectively eighteen and twenty-two years, and her son-in-law, who constituted all the men in their immediate settlement, and who perhaps alone could have sworn to the exact amount of stock owned by Mr. Boddy, and the exact number destroyed, stolen, or lost, were killed on the 29th of November, when the loss occurred; that her daughter (her only remaining child) and herself, upon seeing the Indians stripping the dead bodies of her son and son-in-law, fled to the mountains to keep from being murdered, and remained there two days without food or shelter, and thinly clad, with snow on the ground; that the witnesses, W. S. Bybee and Dan. Calwell, who were her nearest neighbors, lived three miles south of the Boddy settlement, and that Mr. Hartery and John Fritz, who were her nearest neighbors on the north, lived five and ten miles distant, respectively, and that these witnesses, as soon as practicable after the massacre, assisted in collecting the scattered stock belonging to the Boddy family; that they were frequent visitors at the home of Mrs. Boddy before the massacre and depredation, and that "each of the said men had a good idea of the amount and value of the property and stock" owned by the family, and also were the only persons, except Mrs. Boddy and her daughter, who had knowledge of the amount of stock recovered.

These papers also show that William Boddy and family removed from Roseburg, Oreg., where he had been engaged in merchandising, to the farm occupied by them when he was killed only about four months before the massacre, taking with him the remnants of a stock of goods pertaining to a general country store, about 3,000 sheep, about 75 head of cattle, and about 35 head of horses. The claim made by Mrs. Boddy includes only 5 horses, 1 cow, and 500 sheep, the inference being that the balance of the stock was recovered.

The remainder of the claim as presented to this office for settlement embraces such articles as would naturally be found in the house of a man engaged as Mr. Boddy had previously been and was at the time of his massacre.

The respectability of Mrs. Boddy and the truthfulness of her statement as to the loss of property is abundantly attested by the signatures of about one hundred persons attached to her petition, and among them that of L. S. Dyar, who was the agent for these Indians in 1872, when the depredation was committed, and who, under date of April 24, 1876, in reporting to this office upon this claim, said that the "prices charged for hay, flour, groceries, and sheep are not above the ruling rates at the time and place of the depredations." In that letter he also states from personal knowledge that Mrs. Boddy was a great sufferer from the Modocs, and that much of her property was destroyed by these Indians.

From the evidence now before me I am satisfied that the property mentioned in the schedule found in the paper marked A belonged to William Boddy (husband of Mrs. Lousia Boddy) in his lifetime, and was lost or destroyed as stated in the papers in the case; but the vagueness as to the amounts of quite a number of the articles mentioned leads me to think that in all probability the actual value of some of these articles, at least, has been overestimated, and that the sum of $5,400 would cover the loss; and I therefore respectfully recommend that the papers herewith be returned to the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, with the request that an appropriation of that amount be made in favor of Mrs. Louisa Boddy, widow of William Boddy, deceased.

It is proper to state that, in view of the fact that ever since the Modocs, who perpetrated the depredations under consideration, were removed to the Indian Territory they have been regarded by this office and by Congress as having forfeited all right to any of the benefits inuring to other Modocs under the treaty of October 14, 1864, with the Kalmath, Modoc, and other Indians (16 Stat., p. 707), and have been assisted in self-support by a small gratuity annually appropriated by Congress, so that it would seem that the amount which may be appropriated for the relief of Mrs. Boddy should be taken from the public funds. It may be proper to state, also, that the limitation of time (three years) fixed by the seventeenth section of the act of June 30, 1834 (4 Stat., p. 732), within which Indian depredation claims may be presented, no longer obtains, as this limitation is omitted in the Revised Statutes.

Since the foregoing was written, the attorney for Mrs. Boddy has presented a brief in support of the claim, which is also herewith transmitted.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. PRICE, Commissioner.

Hon. S. J. KIRKWOOD,
Secretary of the Interior.

From all the facts in this case it is quite apparent that the massacre of the settlers on Lost River by the Modocs, on the 29th of November, 1872, was not the result of an ordinary outbreak of those Indians, but the direct result of the attack of the United States troops upon their camp on the morning of that day, with inadequate force, for the purpose of their removal to the Klamath reservation, whither they refused to go, which attempt upon the part of the military authority was made without notice to the settlers scattered along Lost River. Your committee think that this fact makes this an exceptional case, and gives the claimant an equitable right to relief, and therefore fully concur with the Commissioner in his recommendation that the sum of $5,400 be appropriated for the relief of Mrs. Louisa Boddy, widow of William Boddy, deceased, in full compensation of her losses as hereinbefore stated; and therefore report for that purpose the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to oppose the passage of this bill, although I think it is a very unusual one.

The Government, of course, has never held itself liable for damages perpetrated by Indian tribes for property destroyed by persons not under the control of the Government. And yet there seems to be a feature about the bill and accompanying report that may take the claim now presented out of this general rule of the absence of liability on the part of the General Government. In this case the Government was seeking to remove the Indians mentioned in the report from their reservation to another with an inadequate force and the attempt resulted in an outbreak. The Government, owing to its insufficient force, was unable to prevent this outbreak and effect a peaceful settlement of these Indians. I conceive that the case is not a very strong one against the Government. It does not so present itself to me. And yet if the claim is put as it ought, perhaps, to be put, on the ground of a gratuity, based upon the peculiar circumstances of the case, it seems that the child of this settler should be taken into account as well as the widow. I see that the child is omitted. The bill proposes that $5,400 is to be paid to the mother, and yet the report shows that there is a surviving daughter. My friend from Oregon can perhaps explain it.

Mr. GEORGE. The bill is entirely satisfactory to all persons concerned.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, is it also to this daughter?

Mr. GEORGE. Entirely so.

Mr. HOLMAN. But upon the ground that it is almost a gratuity, under the peculiar circumstances of the case? I am not inclined, however, to oppose the measure, though I should not be willing to acquiesce in the passage of the bill on the ground of its being a valid claim. It could not rest upon that ground.

Mr. HENLEY. Having some personal knowledge of the parties concerned in this measure, I can contribute my testimony to that of the gentleman from Oregon. The bill is in a perfectly satisfactory shape to all of the parties concerned as it is.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are any persons concerned in this matter except the mother and daughter?

Mr. HENLEY. No other persons.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is the daughter here?

Mr. STEVENS. There were two sons who were killed at the same time with the father.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the daughter; what about her?

Mr. STEVENS. She acquiesces and makes no claim.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. BINGHAM took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Several messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

MRS. LOUISA BODDY.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. GEORGE] that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I desire to state that this bill was maturely investigated and considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs in the last Congress, of which I was a member. I became satisfied that the measure was a proper one. It was unanimously reported by the committee to the House. I think, sir, the bill ought to pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. CRISP. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 120, noes 7.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the committee do now rise. It is known that there is to be a session to-night for the consideration of pension bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BAYNE. I withdraw the motion for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state in regard to the bill just directed by the committee to be laid aside to be reported favorably there is an amendment by the Committee on Indian Affairs which has not been acted upon. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 6 and 7 strike out "$6,180" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,400."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CRISP. Can I say a word now?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. I want to explain the reason why I can not vote for this bill. It was stated by the gentleman who advocated it that the contemplated appropriation was purely a gratuity.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CRISP. Then I shall be glad to have the gentleman explain the reason for the bill, for he has hitherto failed to do so. There has been no statement made on the floor of this House tending to show that there was any legal or equitable liability on the part of the Government to reimburse this lady for her losses. I would be glad to have the gentleman from Oregon explain the reason why the committee propose in this exceptional case, as they call it, to make this payment? I ask the committee to examine for a moment what this case is.

Mr. Boddy, I suppose, was one of that adventurous and useful class of men who go out on the borders of civilization for the purpose of bettering his condition. He went out there with his family and household goods. The Government, in the exercise of a lawful right, sought to remove the Modoc Indians. The Indians resisted, overcame the troops, and destroyed the lives and property of many of the settlers. Mr. Boddy was killed, much of his property destroyed, and this bill is to pay Mrs. Boddy the value of the property so destroyed by the Indians. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who is usually found objecting to appropriations from the public Treasury that are not strictly due therefrom, stated that because this was an exceptional case he would not object. Now, what are the facts which he presents to take it out of the general rule? Simply that the Government undertook to remove these Indians with an inadequate force. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana and any other gentleman on this floor if that gives to these parties the right to go to the public Treasury to be reimbursed.

Is there anything else in this case? Is it true that this Congress is to vote gratuities to people? Is it true that because a person suffers in consequence of the wrongful act of officers of the Government the Government is to make the loss good? Is that true?

The highest court in this land has decided that the Government is not responsible for the tortuous acts of its officers; that the Government is not responsible for the illegal and wrongful exercise of power by its officers. Now view this case in the most favorable light you can for the applicant, and is it more than that? The Government undertook to remove the Modoc Indians. This gentleman had gone with his family and property where he had a right to go, on the frontier near the Indians. He was doubtless, as I have said, one of that adventurous and useful class of men who go out on the borders of civilization for the purpose of making a living. Men who locate in such places always take their lives in their hands. They always take the risk of the destruction of their property. They set their lives and property upon a cast and should abide the hazard of the die. But the passage of this bill will establish a precedent that when men take this risk and are losers the General Government shall reimburse them or their representatives for their losses. There is nothing else in the case but that. I yield to no man in my sympathy for this good lady. I sympathize with her and all others who are bowed down with care and impoverished by losses. But, Mr. Chairman, all over this land you will find meritorious cases that appeal to your pity.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield further time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. All over this country you will find cases that appeal to your sympathy. I ask, Mr. Chairman, if this House is to vote money from the public Treasury for any such reason as that?

Why, sir, within a few days past the State in which I live has been visited by a cyclone which swept from the face of the earth in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, the accumulations of years. Those people suffer and many of them are in need. Will you reimburse them their losses? Is there any difference in principle between that case and this? Is it to be understood that the Government of the United States is to reimburse all those who are unfortunate or all those who through the unauthorized acts of officers of the Government suffer injury?

I only want to call the attention of the committee to the principle involved here. I want the committee to understand it. I can not believe from the vote that was just had on this case that the committee did understand it. I think I have stated the case fairly. If there is a single reason for paying this sum except on the ground of an appeal to sympathy no such reason has yet been given, none occurs to me, and I ask the gentleman to show any such reason if any such exists. None other is presented in the report of the committee. In that report the facts are stated as I have given them. But the committee do say therein that this is an exceptional case. What makes it exceptional? The reason given by the committee is that the Government of the United States undertook to remove the Indians with an inadequate force and failed to give the settlers notice. That is all. And admitting for the sake of the argument that the officers of the Government did wrong, then it simply makes a case where injury results from the wrongful act of a public officer, and, as I stated before, the highest court in this country has repeatedly determined that the Government is not responsible in damages for such acts of its officers or agents. No one questions the correctness of my statement of the facts, no one questions or can question my statements of the law, and yet the committee seems inclined in the face of the facts and law to pass this bill. I think such an action wrong in principle, and believe that in passing this bill the House will establish a precedent that will result in great expense to the tax-payers of this country.

I thank the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] for his kindness in giving me a part of his time and I thank the committee for their indulgence and attention. I only wanted to call its attention to the case as I understand it, and I have done so.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think it necessary to make any further explanation of this bill. The remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] are upon an amendment which proposes to reduce the amount from $6,180 to $5,400. There certainly can be no objection to that amendment.

As to the main question, if the House desires to hear a full statement in regard to this bill of the principles upon which this claim is founded, principles of law and justice and precedents numbering over one hundred passed by the American Congress, I stand ready to give them at any time.

Mr. HENLEY. If this House is going to reverse its policy in respect to these matters, is to go back on all the precedents of the past, I hope it will not select this unfortunate woman for its first subject.

Mr. BUDD. So far as this matter is concerned the gentleman from Georgia states that he sees no reason why this bill should pass; that the damages sustained in this case should be treated the same as damage in all other cases. But while in other cases where damage is sustained by citizens or persons or property a right of action accrues to the injured party, in the case of Indian depredations the Government of the United States, having adopted the Indians as its wards, refuses to allow action, and the Indians can commit crimes if they wish and the civil authorities are powerless; no one who has suffered depredations committed by these Indians has any right to proceed in the courts. I say that so long as we have these Indians as our wards we should pay for the damages done by them; so long as the Government of the United States permits these their wards to do damage to persons and property and refuse to allow those who sustain such damage to recover the same from the Indians or their property, so long as it sustains and supports the red man in his crimes and depredations, and so long as it stands between the Indians and their victims, it should pay for all damages sustained. There is a strong equitable if not a legal claim against the Government in such cases. This is one of them.

Mr. WELLBORN. I desire to say that this claim has undergone the investigation of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I think this bill has been reported unanimously from that committee. It is fully sustained by precedents. In reimbursing this widow for the damages which she has suffered from these Indian depredations the Government will be doing nothing more than performing a duty toward a citizen which it owes to its citizens. It was the clear duty of the Government to restrain the Indians on their reservations; that was not done, and because of that an outbreak occurred during which this damage was sustained.

Mr. STEVENS. There is another reason why this bill should pass, and in point of fact that reason will prove that this is not a gratuity on the part of the Government.

Before this depredation was committed, before this damage was sustained, the Modocs had certain funds, had annuities, and there were stipulations with them under provisions of treaties. After the acts of aggression by them against the United States Government and its citizens in 1864 those treaty stipulations were canceled, those annuities were taken away from them, and all the rights, interests, and moneys which had theretofore been guaranteed to them by the Government reverted back to the Government. Had that not been done the amount to pay for the damages in this case could have been taken from the Indian fund. But the Government has that fund, the Government has those annuities, and having them, there is no reason why the Government should not pay this woman for the damages she has sustained. It is under these circumstances not a gratuity on the part of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must protest against the proposition submitted that except upon the principle of paying out of the funds due to the Modoc tribe of Indians this is in any considerable sense a legal claim against the United States. It can not be.

When gentlemen assume that there are precedents for an appropriation out of the national Treasury to pay for spoliations committed by the Indian tribes, I think upon examination it will be found that they are under an entire misapprehension. The only extent to which the Government has recognized its liability in such cases has been to the extent of paying out of the funds held by it in trust for the Indians committing the depredations. Inasmuch as immediately after that outbreak the Government annulled the annuities payable to these Indians, revoked them entirely, and has since that time simply provided for their subsistence from time to time so far as charity and mercy might require, the position of gentlemen can not be well sustained.

The only ground upon which I think this claim can rest at all is simply this: that the Government in attempting to remove the Modoc Indians did not perhaps make use of that degree of precaution in doing a very important act affecting the peace and repose of that region of country which ought to have been used. In an equitable sense, perhaps, but remotely so, the Government should be held responsible for the result. Upon that ground, and that alone, I have been inclined to acquiesce in the passage of this bill without giving it a negative vote. But I can not assent to the proposition that the Government of the United States is responsible for all of the acts of spoliation committed by Indian tribes on their reservations.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman——

Many MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. GEORGE. I will call for a vote.

The question was taken upon the amendment reported from the committee, to strike out "$6,180" and to insert "$5,400," and it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the motion of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. GEORGE] that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move that the committee rise. It is getting late, and there is to be a session of the House to-night.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report two bills to the House with amendments, and to recommend that the amendments be adopted and the bills passed.

ALFRED PLEASONTON.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 1101) to authorize the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton a major-general.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is this bill now at such a stage that I can move to recommit it with instructions?

Mr. BAYNE. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules it is in order to move to recommit a bill, with or without instructions, even when the previous question has been ordered and when the question is upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If it is in order now, I desire to make such a motion.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order now, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] had demanded the previous question upon the adoption of the amendment and the ordering of the bill to be engrossed and read a third time. When this question is disposed of, the motion indicated by the gentleman from Indiana will be in order.

The previous question was ordered.

The following amendment, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, was read:

In line 11 strike out the words "such major-general" and insert the words "a colonel."

Mr. BAYNE. There is another amendment—an amendment to the title.

The SPEAKER. That does not come up at this stage.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BAYNE. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Pending that, I move——

The SPEAKER. It is now in order to move to recommit.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions——

The SPEAKER. The bill came from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move, then, that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, with the instructions which I have sent to the desk.

Mr. BAYNE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the motion, after which the Chair will hear the point of order. [A pause.] The proposed instructions do not appear to be in the possession of the Clerk. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] will state them.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. My motion is that the bill be recommitted with instructions that the committee strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to put the name of Alfred Pleasonton on the pension-roll at the rate of $100 per month, the said pension to begin from and after the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will now state his point of order.

Mr. BAYNE. I make the point of order that it is out of order to move to refer a bill to a committee that has not jurisdiction of the subject.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The House may charge the committee with this power.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that point of order is well taken.

Mr. BAYNE. I submit that it requires a two-thirds vote to do it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Oh, no.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not see how a subject-matter not properly referable under the rules to a particular committee can without a suspension of the rules be so referred.

The SPEAKER. The rule, of course, would govern the Chair absolutely in making the reference of a bill; but it very frequently happens that the House refers a bill to an entirely different committee from the one which the Chair would suppose under the rules had jurisdiction of it.

Mr. BAYNE. I make the further point that the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana is not germane to the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is a different proposition The Chair will hear the gentleman on that.

Mr. BAYNE. My point is that the proposed instructions undertake in an indirect way to ingraft upon this bill an amendment which failed for want of propriety in Committee of the Whole. To move to instruct a committee to change a bill from one to retire an officer to one granting a pension is an attempt to accomplish indirectly what could not be accomplished under the rules by direct means.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs was a bill for the relief of Alfred Pleasonton. The relief proposed in the original bill was by reinstating him in the Army and then placing him on the retired-list, so that he might receive certain compensation from the Treasury of the United States. The amendment which I have embodied in the proposed instructions proceeds still upon the ground of affording Alfred Pleasonton relief in money. The difference is as to the manner in which that relief is to be given. In one case it is proposed to be given by putting him on the retired-list, in the other by putting him on the pension-roll. Now I think it would require all the ingenuity even of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to conjure up in his imagination an objection to this proposition under any rule.

Mr. MAGINNIS. This is not "a bill for the relief of Alfred Pleasonton." The bill provides that he shall be appointed to a certain rank in the Army and then placed upon the retired-list. As an officer on the retired-list he might be, for instance, assigned as an instructor in a college or be called on for the performance of any other duties to which an officer on the retired-list may be assigned.

Now, the gentleman's amendment proposes entirely to change the nature of the bill, not to leave him where he would be under the orders of the Government, not subject to the rules and regulations of the retired-list, but to put him on the pension-roll. The Speaker must see it is entirely a different bill in nature, in principle, and in spirit, if these instructions are permitted to be voted on is in order.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if we can not change the character of a bill, then there is no necessity for its recommittal. The fact that under the rules we may recommit a bill is to enable us to change in some degree the nature of the act proposed. I submit this as reported by the committee originally was a private bill. It continues under my amendment to be a private bill. It was a bill originally for the relief of Alfred Pleasonton. It still continues to be a bill for the relief of Alfred Pleasonton. It was for pecuniary relief. It continues to be of that character under the instructions I propose to give.

The fact that in one case he goes on the Army retired-list and in the other on the pension-roll I confess does not make such a difference as to prevent the House sending the bill back to the committee with instructions.

Now, the object of this motion to recommit with instructions, Mr. Speaker, is to change the character of the bill and the character of the relief afforded. To be sure, I could not substitute the name of John Smith for Alfred Pleasonton. It is true I could not change wholly the character of the relief, but where it still proceeds to relieve the same person and practically in the same way, to my mind it certainly is germane and in order.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND. Why could you not make a motion entirely different from this bill? This is not a motion to amend anything in the bill, but to instruct a committee what to do about a certain bill. Why, then, can not you do what you wish to do without regard to its being germane?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not know any reason why we can not do that if we wish to.

Mr. HAMMOND. I thought you were conceding that point, that the House could not do it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. No; on the contrary, I am trying to make my point good, even conceding the proposition of the gentleman from Montana, and showing to the Speaker that it is a proper motion to submit.

Mr. BAYNE. I have only one word to say in support of the point of order which I have submitted. There is something in the nature and principle of parliamentary law as in the nature and principle of all other laws, and if the proceedings of this House and the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar are to be conducted accordingly, then of necessity the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana must be ruled out of order

For this reason, Mr. Speaker: The instruction now proposed, when proposed as an amendment to the bill while it was being considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, was properly ruled by the chairman of the committee to be out of order. To come in now and ask the House to do what was improper for a committee to do, in order to get the end accomplished by another means, seems to me to violate all the principles of parliamentary law. If it shall be accepted as proper and in order under the rules of the House, then there will be no end whatever to the course of action which bills may have to submit to.

It is not in good taste, it seems to me, in view of the action already taken by this body; and why? Because a competent Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar has already determined what course this bill shall take by reporting it back to the House with the recommendation that it shall pass as amended. And now you propose to incorporate an amendment which is not only out of order, it seems to me, but to be a breach of the privilege of the committee, which is that it shall have jurisdiction on certain definite subjects.

The SPEAKER. The rule involved in the question of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] is one of the most difficult ones the Chair is called on to administer, because it frequently happens it is almost impossible to determine whether the proposed amendment does or does not relate to the same general subject with the bill.

There is no difficulty on the first point made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND], because it has been decided very frequently that it is not competent for the House to accomplish indirectly in the form of instruction what could not be done by an amendment offered upon the floor.

In the present case the bill is one which proposes to restore General Pleasonton to the Army of the United States and give him rank and pay as a retired officer. The proposition the gentleman from Indiana wishes to embody in his instruction is not to restore him to the Army and give him rank and pay as a military officer of the United States, but simply to give him a pension, while he still remains out of the military service. While it is difficult to determine precisely the application of this rule in all cases, the Chair is inclined to think that this does not relate to the same subject with the bill before the House, and that the proposition is accordingly not in order.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I regret to differ with the Speaker. I know that he knows a great deal more about parliamentary law than I do or ever will. But as this question has come before the House in this shape for the first time—for the first time at least within my recollection—in order to crystallize the action of the House on this subject I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Of course each case must depend upon its own attendant circumstances, and there can be no general rule laid down different from the written rule of the House, which is that such amendments or motions must relate to the same subject-matter.

It is always agreeable to the Chair to have the House pass upon its decisions.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The question was taken; and the Speaker decided that by the sound the ayes had it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am satisfied that the ayes have it, but I will ask a division.

The House divided; and there were ayes 112.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The vote is so decisive in favor of sustaining the decision of the Chair that I shall not call for the other side.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the appeal is laid on the table.

Mr. STEELE. I move now to recommit this bill with the following instructions——

Mr. BAYNE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Can there be more than one motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. There can not; but the motion to recommit of the gentleman from Indiana was held to be out of order. It was not entertained by the House.

The Clerk will read the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to report a bill to place upon the retired-list of the Army all officers and soldiers who served in the late civil war and were honorably discharged who are suffering from total disabilities from wounds received in the line of duty with the rank of colonel, together with the bill restoring Alfred H. Pleasonton as colonel on the retired-list of the Army.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I make the point of order that that changes the bill from a private one to a public one and is not germane.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Unless the gentleman from Indiana desires to be heard upon the point of order the Chair will decide it now.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I made the motion that the House adjourn under a misapprehension, forgetting that there was an evening session for pension business. I move, therefore, that the House take a recess until 7.30 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

The question was taken. The House divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 87.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. No quorum. Let us have tellers.

Several MEMBERS. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. SHELLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Pending that, I ask the gentleman to allow me to make a report from the Committee on Appropriations. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. MATSON. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, I move that the House take a recess until the hour fixed for reassembling.

The SPEAKER. That motion is now pending, but the motion to adjourn takes precedence.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman to give way to permit the gentleman from Illinois, under instructions from the Committee on Appropriations, to report one of the regular appropriation bills in order to have it printed and referred this evening.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This is a general appropriation bill.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I do not care what it is; let us get through with this matter first.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 93.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask my friend to yield to me to present a bill from the Committee on Appropriations making appropriations for the postal service.

The SPEAKER. The House is now taking a vote on the question of adjournment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It can be done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. It can.

Mr. BAYNE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were refused, 10 members only voting in favor thereof.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will not the gentleman yield to me now to report this bill with a view of having it printed?

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I have no objection to reporting that bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws his objection.

Mr. BAYNE. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] that the House take a recess until 7.30 o'clock. Upon that no quorum voted. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, and Mr. STOCKSLAGER were appointed tellers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Who made the point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen made the point. The tellers will take their places.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 130.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 9—not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the House refused to take a recess.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I move that when the House adjourns it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. May I ask a parliamentary question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Would this motion, if carried, do away with the session to-night?

The SPEAKER. It would not. The motion is simply that when the House adjourns to-day, at whatever time that may be, it shall be to meet on Monday next.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn over, there were—yeas 84, noes 80.

Mr. YORK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 42—more than one-fifth of the last vote.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 70, nays 147, not voting 103; as follows:

YEAS—70.

So the motion was not agreed to.

At 5 o'clock, the first roll-call having been completed,

Mr. STOCKSLAGER said: I see the time has arrived at which the House agreed to take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the roll-call can be interrupted.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. That was the point as to which I desired to address a question to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will declare the recess immediately after the roll-call is completed.

The second call of the roll was then proceeded with.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. Pending the announcement of the vote, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] again asks unanimous consent to report a general appropriation bill, in order that it may be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I give notice that I shall call up this bill immediately after the disposition of the naval appropriation bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 70 and the nays 147. The motion is not agreed to.

And then, in accordance with the order of the House (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.), the House took a recess until 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the order of the House under which the session is held this evening.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the pension bills on the Private Calendar, in accordance with the order of the House just read.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 999) granting a pension to the sole surviving grandchild of the author of the Declaration of Independence be passed over informally when reached in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Not to lose its place on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The bill would retain its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The motion of Mr. MATSON was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the pension bills on the Private Calendar, in pursuance of the order of the House read not long since.

JOSEPH B. SELLERS.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 432) to increase the pension of Joseph B. Sellers; reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. MATSON.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Joseph B. Sellers, who now holds pension certificate No. 34275, to $36 per month, to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 432) granting an increase of pension to Joseph B. Sellers, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

This pensioner lost a leg below the knee by reason of a gunshot wound received in battle near Dallas, Ga., on the 25th day of May, 1864. The amputation was made on the day after the wound was received and in the field hospital. The leg was taken off just below the knee and so near the joint that it has so affected it that it is impossible for the pensioner to wear an artificial leg. The examining surgeon who last examined the pensioner says in his report that there is a very tender cicatrix, and, owing to the shape and position of the stump, he is unable to adjust or wear an ordinary artificial limb, and, as a matter of fact, has never been able to wear one. Besides this, as shown by the reports of the examining surgeons, this soldier, on the 3d day of July, 1880, was six feet and four inches high and weighed two hundred and fifty-three pounds. Owing to his great weight and the tender condition of the cicatrix he could not wear an artificial limb even if the amputation had been more skillful.

He alleged, in an application for an increase of his pension, the fact that he had incurred hemorrhoidal piles while in the line of his duty in making a severe march to Culpeper Court House, Va. But on account of this disability no increase could be granted him unless it was shown that on account thereof he was totally helpless.

This committee has no doubt that he should receive as much for the loss of his leg as if it had been taken off above the knee, and also that he should have the sum allowed him by the examining surgeon for hemorrhoidal piles, to wit, $6 per month, making $36 per month. We therefore recommend the passage of this bill.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CATHERINE HUNTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1897) granting a pension to Catherine Hunter; reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. MATSON.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Catherine Hunter, widow of Levi M. Hunter, late a private in Company A, One hundred and twentieth Indiana Volunteers, from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1897) granting a pension to Catherine Hunter, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

This case was sent to Congress under the joint resolution directing the Commissioner of Pensions to recommend such cases for the action of Congress as in his opinion seemed to be meritorious, but not within the operation of the general laws.

The claimant in this case is the widow of Levi M. Hunter, who died on the 4th day of January, 1882, leaving a widow and two children. He had been for a lengthy period, just prior to his death, drawing the largest pension known to the law, and had been during that time confined to his bed and unable to help himself on account of rheumatism contracted in the service and in the line of duty. While so confined he was attacked with typhoid fever and died of it. The evidence shows that the rheumatism for which he was pensioned would have soon produced his death, but as he did not die of that his widow could not be pensioned.

The Commissioner of Pensions also states in his letter "that the widow is a deserving person, having during all the period of the soldier's disability labored to support the family."

In view of the foregoing facts, this committee, without hesitation, recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection it will be so ordered.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I object, and call for a division on that motion.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 2.

So (no further count being called for) the motion was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

NANCY ELLIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2979) granting a pension to Nancy Ellis; reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. MATSON.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nancy Ellis, widow of James Ellis, late a private in Company G, First Regiment Alabama Vidette Cavalry Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2979) granting a pension to Nancy Ellis, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

Nancy Ellis is the widow of James Ellis, who was a resident of the county of De Kalb, in the State of Alabama, up to the time of his death.

It is clearly proven that he was opposed to secession, and escaped from his home to avoid service in the confederate army. He went to Indiana, and there enlisted, at the instance of Allen Lea, who was then second lieutenant of Company C, First Alabama Vidette Cavalry, in the United States Army, and who was detailed to recruit a company for said regiment, to be known as Company G. After enlisting he was taken to Stevenson, Ala., where said Company G was being organized, for the purpose of being mustered into the service. On the way he was greatly exposed to intense cold, and died of pneumonia at Stevenson, Ala., in two or three days after his arrival there.

When he enlisted he was in good health, and the witnesses speak of him at that time as being the best specimen of manhood and good health among a large number of recruits enlisted at and about the same time.

Clothing was issued to him at Louisville, Ky., as a soldier of the United States, and he was buried in the uniform of a soldier of the Union Army.

As he was not mustered into the service, his widow can not obtain a pension through the regular channels; but this committee believe that he was to all intents and purposes a soldier of the Union, and that his widow should be pensioned. And as all the above facts are indisputably proven, the passage of the accompanying bill is cheerfully recommended.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

LEVI ANDERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3625) granting an increase of pension to Levi Anderson; reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions with amendments by Mr. MORRILL.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in lieu of the pension of $30 per month which Levi Anderson is now receiving under act of Congress approved March 3, 1883, for a gunshot wound in the left hip-joint, there is hereby granted to said Anderson the sum of $50 per month, commencing from March 1, 1884, on account of said gunshot wound in the left hip-joint, and also on account of a gunshot wound in the right shoulder, both of said wounds having been received by him in an engagement with rebel troops at White Oak, Jackson County, Missouri, and both of said injuries resulting now in total disability of said Anderson.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom the subject was referred, submit the following report:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, having considered the petition (and papers accompanying) of Levi Anderson, late private in Company A, Seventh Kansas Cavalry, asking an increase of pension, find that said soldier was wounded on the 11th day of November, 1861, receiving a bad fracture of the thigh-bone, the result of a gunshot wound received in the battle at White Oak, Jackson County, Missouri. He was treated for two years in the United States hospital and then discharged. The leg is seven inches shorter than the other, and is useless. He also received a gunshot wound in his shoulder. He was pensioned from the date of his discharge at the rate of $8 per month, which was increased in 1871 to $15, and in August, 1872, to $18. In 1882, by special act, it was increased to $30. He now asks that he be allowed $50 per month. From the excessive disability existing, entirely incapacitating him from all labor, we recommend that the bill be amended so as to give him a pension of $40 per month, commencing from and after the passage of this act.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were to reduce the sum named in the bill from $50 to $40 per month, and to strike out "March 1, 1884" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "the passage of this act;" so that it would read: "there is hereby granted to said Anderson the sum of $40 per month, commencing from the passage of this act," &c.

The question was upon agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I understand from the reading of the report in this case that this man has had his pension increased by act of Congress some four times. He is now drawing a pension of $30 per month, the highest pension known under the general law, except where the party has lost both eyes, both arms, or both legs. I think that a pension of $30 per month is sufficient.

Mr. MATSON. The author of this report, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL], is absent from the city. Perhaps the report is not as full as it should have been made. It does not state, nor is it the fact, that this pensioner has received the favor of Congress three or four times. He has received it but once.

He was pensioned by operation of the general law first at $8 per month, which was then the highest rate allowed; then his pension was increased by general law, not by special act, to $15 per month, and afterward to $18 per month. In the last Congress, in 1882, his pension was increased to $30 per month. The reason for that was that because of a deficiency in the law there was no provision made for any rate of pension between $24 and $50 per month.

This man had reached a stage of incapacity beyond any capacity for the performance of manual labor, but had not quite reached the degree of total helplessness which required the regular aid and attendance of another person, and therefore he was not entitled to the pension of $50 per month for total disability under the general law.

When the act of the last Congress was passed it was thought that $30 per month would be sufficient, but the condition of this pensioner has gradually become worse and worse, until now, as shown, he approaches so nearly the condition of total helplessness as almost to require the constant aid and attendance of another person. He has not reached quite that condition, because if he had he would receive a pension of $50 a month under the general law. He has arrived so nearly to that condition that the committee have agreed to fix a rate, which they thought was equitable, of $40 a month.

I have said that this report was not quite as full as it should have been made. I remember the circumstances of the case very well, and I think that perhaps the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] can give the committee a full statement of the case. The gentleman who made the report stated to the committee the facts of the case very fully, more fully than they are given in the report. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think we ought to have a full House to act on a bill of this character.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is upon the amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MATSON. I will ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over informally, so that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL], who, as I have said, is now absent, may have an opportunity to explain the matter more satisfactorily at a subsequent session for pension business or that the bill may take the ordinary course upon the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill will be laid aside informally.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SARAH DAYTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1025) granting a pension to Sarah Dayton, widow of Erastus G. Dayton; reported by Mr. BAGLEY from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Sarah Dayton, widow of Erastus G. Dayton, late acting ensign under General J. G. Foster, who received a grape-shot wound during the rebellion and died from the effects thereof.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 1025, beg leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner, Sarah Dayton, widow of Erastus G. Dayton, asks to be placed upon the pension-rolls for the loss of her husband, who performed meritorious service in the late war. Captain Dayton's bravery at Newbern and Roanoke Island proves that he was incited by the purest patriotism, and was willing to risk his life in defense of his country. At the time he received the wounds, which undoubtedly resulted in his death, he was not an enlisted man, but was in command of the United States schooner Highlander, engaged in the transportation of troops and munitions of war. Captain Dayton, with twelve men selected from his own crew, went on shore with a 12-pounder Wiard gun, and with almost superhuman exertions, succeeded in placing his piece in position first, and sturdily maintained his ground. General Foster ordered him up to dismount a gun, and he found six guns all pouring a raking fire upon him. During the action he was struck by a grape-shot in the breast. The wound, at the moment, was not supposed to be serious, but subsequent examination proved two ribs to be broken. He resigned and went home in poor health, in August, 1862.

In March, 1863, supposing himself sufficiently strong to again engage in his country's service, he accepted the appointment of acting ensign in the Navy, and was ordered to the gunboat Wissahickon, stationed off Charleston. During the night assault on Fort Sumter, September 8, 1863, he was captured, and kept as a prisoner over thirteen months. Upon his release he obtained leave of absence for three months, and, although suffering from troubles in the chest and side, induced by the wounds received at Newbern, determined to again join the fleet, although urged by his friends not to do so. He was on the gunboat Nereus at the storming of Fort Fisher, volunteering again for shore duty, and was among the few who remained and did service as "sharp-shooters."

In March, 1865, he resigned, broken in health. The evidence is strong that Dayton's wounds at Newbern and exposure and privations in Southern prisons produced pulmonary difficulties that caused his death. This man's bravery and pertinacity in battle were the subject of newspaper comment at the time, and he received notable commendation from the officers under whom he served. General Burnside was especially interested in his case. He never applied for a pension, and died in 1879. His widow, who is quite destitute now, asks aid from the Government for herself and children as a partial recompense for his services and her loss. Your committee, recognizing the justice of the claim, recommend the passage of bill H. R. 1025, with the following amendment, after the last word, as follows: "And that she be paid the pension of a widow of an ensign in the Navy."

The following amendment, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was read and agreed to:

Add to the bill the following: "And that she be paid the pension of a widow of an ensign in the Navy."

Mr. BAGLEY. I move that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MILES B. FARLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1076) granting a pension to Miles B. Farlin; reported by Mr. BAGLEY from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Miles B. Farlin, late a private in Company C, Thirty-first Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, in the war of the rebellion.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1076) beg leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner for whose benefit House bill 1076 is introduced enlisted December 27, 1861, in Company G, Thirty-first Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, and while on duty at Mansfield, La., and at the battle of Sabine Cross-Roads he was taken prisoner, and sent to the prison stockade, Camp Ford, near Tyler, Tex., where he was for about three months, and owing to the exposure and privations of his imprisonment his health was broken down, which resulted in rheumatism of the heart and other difficulties. The march of about two hundred miles from the place of capture to the stockade, over the hot sands, produced trouble in the feet, which became so swollen that he could not wear a boot or shoe for six weeks, and this difficulty has not yet disappeared. There was no hospital at Tyler, and the confederates appropriated the chest of medicines sent for the prisoners by General Banks.

The family physician certifies that Farlin has disease of the heart and general rheumatism, and also that his condition is such that he is able to perform but little labor and is not able to support his family.

Rev. Theodore F. Burnham, pastor of the church of which Farlin is a member, certifies to the good character and standing of the petitioner, and says that, owing to certain disabilities received while in the United States service, he is unable to support himself.

The case was not allowed by the Pension Office because of the inability to obtain the evidence of officers and comrades, who could not be found.

The committee think that because of this petitioner's services and suffering there is sufficient ground for granting him a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of House bill 1076.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is this bill in the ordinary form?

Mr. BAGLEY. It is. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorable to the House.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

ROBERT NUTT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2419) granting a pension to Robert Nutt; reported by Mr. BAGLEY from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Robert Nutt, late a private in Company I, One hundred and forty-fourth New York Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2419), beg leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner, Robert Nutt, enlisted August 18, 1862, in Company F, One hundred and forty-fourth regiment New York Volunteers, and was discharged June 25, 1865. While marching from Camp Chase to Camp Morning, in the State of Virginia, he was injured in the left foot by the rubbing of a shoe, which caused a running sore that never healed, and which eventually rendered amputation necessary. The amputation was made about six inches above the instep, on the 3d day of February, 1875. Nutt was treated by the regimental surgeon in camp, and by other surgeons, but without favorable result. His case was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the injury to the foot was received in childhood, and it is alleged that this was the origin of the disease that necessitated the amputation.

The evidence, however, is not sufficiently strong to warrant this conclusion. On the contrary, it is shown that the trouble in the foot, in his earlier years, was overcome, and that it became to all appearances perfectly sound. Admitting it to have been the remote cause, it was greatly aggravated by service in the field, and long, continuous marches; without which aggravation the man would not have lost his foot. Abundant evidence is adduced to show that the petitioner did suffer as alleged while in the Army. It is also shown by many of his neighbors and others who employed him before the war that no disability of the foot was observed, and that he was perfectly able to perform manual labor. Although the injury to the foot occurred in October, 1862, Nutt continued in the service, the sore being constantly irritated. Your committee are of the opinion that as this soldier served faithfully three years in the Army, and that the origin of the disability was caused while in said service, he should be recompensed, and therefore recommend the passage of bill H. R. No. 2419.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Why could not this man receive a pension under the general law?

Mr. BAGLEY. The application was rejected at the Pension Office on the ground that the injury which necessitated amputation was originally received in childhood. But the evidence of the attending physicians went to show that the difficulty which had arisen in childhood was subsequently overcome, and that the injury which rendered amputation necessary was caused by the rubbing of the shoe while the man was marching during service in the Army. We examined the evidence carefully and thought it conclusive upon this point.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Why did not the Commissioner of Pensions take that view of the case?

Mr. BAGLEY. The gentleman will remember that the Pension Office is very particular in regard to receiving affidavits given by physicians who have attended in cases coming before the office.

A MEMBER. They should be particular.

Mr. BAGLEY. I admit it. But while the examining surgeons in this case were not willing to accept the conclusions of these attending physicians, the committee believed that these physicians testified truly, and that the injury which necessitated amputation was received in the Army. It is possible, of course, that these physicians may have erred and that the conclusions of the examining surgeons should be accepted; but this man served faithfully, and in the opinion of the committee is entitled to a pension.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is not this a mere difference between the Pension Office and the committee as to the effect which should be allowed to certain evidence?

Mr. BAGLEY. That may be true; but the gentleman should remember that most of these cases coming before the Committee on Invalid Pensions are cases which have been rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions. We are not bound, as the Commissioner is, by the strict letter of the law. The committee bases its opinion upon evidence which it deems trustworthy. We regard this case as meritorious, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

WILLIAM J. LEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1073) granting a pension to William J. Lee; reported by Mr. BAGLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of William J. Lee, late confidential scout and guide, headquarters Army of the Potomac, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, as though he had been regularly mustered into the United States Army.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 1073, ask leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner, William J. Lee, was a scout in the late war, and rendered valuable and perilous service. The case is well stated in the affidavit of Deputy Provost-Marshal-General George H. Sharpe, Army of the Potomac, who says:

"I am well acquainted with William J. Lee, and have known him many years. About March, 1864, I was deputy provost-marshal-general, Army of the Potomac; that said Lee was under my immediate command, and was on duty under my orders to ascertain the movements of the enemy; that at the time stated above said Lee might have contracted, and probably did contract, rheumatism, or the permanent disability to which he refers, as he was constantly exposed while on said duty as scout in crossing and recrossing the Rappahannock and Rapidan Rivers in Virginia; that his duties were hazardous; that he was frequently compelled to wade and swim the rivers referred to, at all stages of the winter, in order to ascertain the movements of the enemy."

Dr. Taliafero's affidavit says: "Lee was a healthy man and free from rheumatism before service in the Army."

John Langdon, chief of scouts, testifies that the claimant contracted rheumatism in March, 1864, while acting as scout.

C. Christian, druggist, says that Lee has bought medicines for rheumatism at various times during the last ten years of him, and the claimant says he is still suffering and under treatment for the disease. Lee not being an officer or enlisted man, had no title to pension, and hence the rejection by the Pension Office.

The committee are of opinion that it is a meritorious case, and recommend the passage of bill H. R. 1073.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. As I understand, this man was not an enlisted man.

Mr. BAGLEY. No, sir.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Why not?

Mr. BAGLEY. He was employed as a scout, and was never regularly enlisted in the service. We have occasionally passed cases of this kind heretofore.

Mr. STEELE. I think the passage of this bill would be a dangerous precedent. I do not see why we should inaugurate a civil pension-list. If we establish this precedent every man who was employed on a naval vessel or transport during the war will be coming in here and demanding a pension; and in many cases such persons will be just as much entitled to a pension as this man Lee.

Mr. Lee preferred to be a scout because he received more pay for his services. He had the choice of becoming an enlisted man and entitled to receive a pension, but he preferred to be a civilian, to go and come when he pleased, and to receive a greater compensation. For that reason, without extending my remarks, I hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. ROSECRANS. The gentleman from Indiana has made a statement in regard to this matter which ought not to go uncorrected. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not a fact that as a rule people who were scouts were so because they preferred to be such rather than to be subjected to the rules of the Army. I can testify of my own knowledge and experience that various circumstances of fitness, of age, of special qualifications, were the causes of men being employed as scouts. Not unfrequently they were employed as such because they were old. It was also because, being men of great intelligence and standing, they did not desire to be enlisted as privates, and they could not be appointed as company officers, because then they could not be used on scout duty. I should like to have it understood as a matter of fact that as a general rule scouts were not enlisted.

Mr. HORR. As a general rule?

Mr. ROSECRANS. Yes, as a general rule. They were quartermasters' men. Sometimes they were enlisted as scouts and paid out of a special fund.

Mr. HORR. Were there not connected with the Army a large number of men who were not enlisted men, such as teamsters, &c.?

Mr. ROSECRANS. Yes, quite a number of teamsters and others. We usually called them quartermasters' men.

Mr. HORR. Not enlisted?

Mr. ROSECRANS. No.

Mr. HORR. Then I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill to give us some reason why we should step outside of the rule which confines pensions to men who were enlisted and actually in the service, and pension a man who was not a regular member of the Army and was not entitled under the law to a pension? What I mean is this, if we go outside once we enter upon a wide field, as I understand, including teamsters and a large class of men who were never enlisted. Why should we do that? I should like to hear some good reason for it.

Mr. BAGLEY. I will say to the gentleman that we propose to pension this man because of his meritorious service and because of the hazard and exposure he endured while in the Army. He was engaged by the officers of the Army; no doubt about that, as the evidence shows conclusively it was so.

Mr. HORR. For how long?

Mr. BAGLEY. I do not know how long, but he was in the service about two years.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Permit me to ask a question.

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Does the report show this man was injured while performing these services?

Mr. BAGLEY. He contracted a disease which incapacitated him from labor.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. He was not wounded?

Mr. BAGLEY. No, sir.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Where a man was actually in the service of the country, though not enlisted, and wounded, I am in favor of giving him a pension.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Was this man examined by a surgeon in reference to his disability?

Mr. BAGLEY. He was. I ask the Clerk to read General Grant's letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 16, 1880.

DEAR SIR: I would be glad to aid you in any way in my power to procure a pension for your well-deserving services during the rebellion.

I can not specify your services as well as General Meade could if alive, or as General George H. Sharpe—who is living—can, but I know they were hazardous, and attended with much exposure to health as well as personal danger. I hope you may yet get your pension.

Very truly, yours,

U. S. GRANT.

WILLIAM J. LEE.

Mr. BAGLEY. I also ask the Clerk to read another paper which will strengthen this case.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF ATTENDING SURGEON, AND UNITED STATES ARMY DISPENSARY,
Washington, D. C., May 13, 1882.

I certify that William J. Lee, late confidential scout at headquarters Army o the Potomac, has been under medical treatment for rheumatism of the pectoral muscles, intercostal muscles, and muscles of the shoulders and back. This man performed service in the line of duty under circumstances of great exposure to wet and cold weather, night and day, and so far as I am acquainted with the history of his case, it is traced back to the period of his active military service in November, 1863, in the Wine Run campaign to December, 1865.

BASIL NORRIS,
Surgeon, United States Army.

The foregoing is a true copy.

BASIL NORRIS,
Surgeon, United States Army.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 31, 1884.

Mr. BAGLEY. I yield now to the gentleman from Wisconsin, who desires to make a statement with reference to this subject.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I wish simply to make a brief statement, as I think gentlemen have not quite a correct idea, all of them, about the scope of the law bearing upon this subject. I happen to know of one instance since I came here concerning the ruling of the Pension Department upon a similar subject. It was this: A person on a war vessel, who was not an enlisted soldier at all, was either wounded or killed, I do not now remember. His pension claim was brought before the Pension Department and was rejected. It was taken from the Pension Department to the board of appeals, and they there decided that it was not necessary under the law that he should be an enlisted soldier, but that having performed service of that character he was entitled, or his personal representatives, to a pension.

I state this merely to show that this case is not so far out of the way, nor that it furnishes so dangerous a precedent as some gentlemen seem to think. I do not now remember the name of this case, but I know of my own knowledge that such was the ruling on the part of the board of appeals. Whether this present case might, if it had been appealed, have been thus decided, of course I am not able to say.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make one or two observations in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana and in reference to his criticisms, when he says we are about to establish a vicious precedent. I do not think it would be a dangerous precedent, even if we were just about entering upon and making such a precedent. But there are already hundreds of precedents like this, where Congress after Congress since the war, both Republican and Democratic, have granted such relief.

Now, it does not seem to me that at this time we ought to stop and quibble about whether a man who is justly entitled to relief was an enlisted soldier, was mustered in, or whether he performed the service in one department or another. If he risked his life and performed good and faithful services, if he rendered valuable aid to the cause of the Government in the prosecution of the war, for one I am ready to vote a pension to him, no matter what branch of the service he was in, whenever he makes out and presents here a meritorious and proper case for our consideration.

So, again, it is wholly a mistake to say that men were selected for this service because of their own choice; but on the contrary, as the gentleman from California has said, it was because of their adaptability to that service; because of their knowledge of the country; because they possessed some peculiar qualities that fitted them to discharge these duties of scouts; and there is not a man here who has seen any service on either side during the war who does not know that the scouts of the two armies constituted one of the most valuable branches of the military service. Why an exception or objection should be made in regard to a man who performed, as in this case, a valuable duty, because he happened not to be enlisted, I fail to understand.

Mr. STEELE. Before the gentleman from Tennessee sits down I would like to ask him a single question.

Mr. HOUK. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEELE. I would like for the gentleman to name a single precedent for the pensioning of a civilian.

Mr. HOUK. There are any number of precedents. I do not call to mind their names.

Mr. BAYNE. The Mississippi ram fleet furnishes a large number.

Mr. HOUK. Certainly; and there are others. I know of the case of Mr. Ellis, of Tennessee, and there were many others whose names I do not remember; but I venture to assert that the clerks there, on examining the records, could find a hundred precedents at least of this character.

Mr. MATSON was recognized.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana on the right is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEELE. I thought the gentleman from Tennessee had the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Tennessee to yield the floor, and recognized the gentleman from Indiana on the right of the Chair.

Mr. STEELE. I hope the gentleman will permit me to ask one other question.

Mr. MATSON. I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if this man was selected for this duty; and whether it was incumbent upon him to perform the service, if he was selected, unless he was satisfied with the pay?

Mr. HOUK. I will answer the question of the gentleman by another. Does he not know that the entrance to any branch of the service except under the conscript laws was entirely voluntary?

But that is not the sole question to be considered here. The Government accepted this man's service. It amounted to an agreement between them. The question is not as to the manner of coming in or going out, but simply of rendering the service. If he rendered the service and lost his life or his health from wounds or exposure, is he not entitled to reward?

Mr. STEELE. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee think that we ought to begin by keeping our promises to the men who were entitled to pensions and the equalization of bounties?

Mr. HOUK. Yes, sir, I certainly do; and every pension like this is only another step in the right direction of fulfilling onr promises by giving careful consideration and favorable response to every application which comes before us from every class of men who served their country faithfully and honorably during the war. [Applause.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Let me ask the gentleman if he has introduced any general bill covering this point?

Mr. HOUK. Yes, sir; several. The first bill that I introduced here was for such a purpose.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If you want to pension scouts, it should be done by a general law.

Mr. HOUK. No, sir; not for scouts, for this very reason: that each case must necessarily depend, more or less, upon independent conditions and circumstances. And this is more particularly the case with reference to the scout service than any other. No general law could be applicable to all of them. Every meritorious case must stand by itself. If the particular circumstances and conditions which attend the case warrant relief by showing that the service was rendered, that the party discharged his duty and incurred disability, the relief should be granted. But each case must rely upon itself and not on the general features of a bill covering the whole class of cases; and in every such individual case the Government is in honor bound to take care of the party as it does of others. In such a case I say it is the peculiar duty of Congress by special legislation to meet the special requirements of that case and to do justice to that special class of cases.

Mr. MATSON. If this case was one in which the House was establishing a precedent—that is, if it was so important as the gentleman from Indiana, my colleague, seems to think it would be—then I would say this House should pause and more thoroughly discuss this matter than it has been discussed. But we are not establishing a precedent by passing this bill. I am perfectly safe in saying there are scores of cases precisely like this one on the pension-roll by reason of special acts of Congress—scores of them.

Mr. STEELE. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEELE. Was not every single case of this kind rejected by the last Congress? When I spoke of precedents, I meant that since I have been in Congress I do not know of one.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] allow me to answer his colleague?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. The last Congress did not reject claims of this kind. Morris, a scout, was pensioned under circumstances like these, and his was no more meritorious case than is this one.

Mr. MATSON. I am not able to repeat the names of those that have been pensioned, but I am very sure I am correct when I repeat the statement I have made, that there are scores of men on the pension-roll who were spies during the war, who incurred wounds, and who incurred disabilities from disease, and are now on the pension-roll, and placed there by special acts of Congress.

Mr. STEELE. And never were enlisted men?

Mr. MATSON. Spies were not enlisted. They would have had no occasion to come to Congress and ask for pensions if they were enlisted men, because they could then have gone to the department and got their pensions there.

The proposition on the other hand is that a spy is a civilian. It is true he is not an enlisted man. But he renders services that are essentially military and not civil services, and they are services, too, that are particularly hazardous; and when he is caught he is liable to be hung. And this man, it seems by the certificates of the most distinguished men upon our side during the last war, rendered very valuable services of that kind; and letters have been produced here from those men asking that this man be pensioned.

These were dangerous services. They were not civil services; they were military services. And I am sure my colleague from Indiana is not willing to say he would not pension a civilian for military services. I am sure he is not willing to say he would draw the line merely against those who happened not to be mustered in if they were performing military services. That is the distinction. Men ought to be pensioned for military services and not for civil services. To that extent he is right. But here is a case where the man asks to be pensioned purely for military services, and very dangerous, hazardous, and valuable service to the Government; and yet my friend will insist he ought not to be pensioned because he was not regularly mustered in.

My friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] a moment ago said we were here just to meet that kind of cases where men were not technically mustered in. And here is a case which we bring to the House of a man who is entitled to a pension by reason of military services of an arduous character and of disabilities incurred in that kind of service, and because the technicalities of the case are such that it can not be put through the Pension Office. And now it remains for the House to say whether he should be pensioned or not.

Mr. HOUK. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOUK. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] asks me for precedents. Here is a precedent. I could find a hundred if I had time. I ask the Clerk to read an act of the first session of last Congress which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Chap. 406.—An act granting a pension to Amos Chapman.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Amos Chapman, of the Indian Territory, late a scout, under the immediate command of Col. Nelson A. Miles, United States Army, said pensioner to be allowed the same as a private soldier for the loss of a leg.

Approved August 5, 1882.

Mr. HOUK. Now, all I desire to say in the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] is this: The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] called on me for a precedent. I found one; and I am informed by the clerks there are at least a hundred since the war.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask my colleague a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] has been recognized and has the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I have had occasion to investigate this case somewhat, and I speak advisedly when I say that during the war of the rebellion there was not a man of the Army of the Potomac, unless it be some officer of high rank, who rendered such service to the Government as this man Lee did. He was a Virginian, thoroughly acquainted with all the territory of Virginia. He was a particularly bright, active, and educated man. He was a Union man, and was taken into the employ of the Government as a spy. He served almost from the beginning of the war until the end of it. He brought more information to the commanding officers of the Federal Army from the confederate lines than any other spy of the United States Army during the whole war. He was captured once or twice, and was in imminent peril of being executed on the spot. On one occasion he made his escape by what seemed to be almost an interposition of Divine Providence. He escaped, but was compelled to go through the most terrible winter's storm and wade and swim a deep and icy river to get into the Union lines, and in coming brought the most valuable information to the Union Army.

There is a great deal of talk here about the danger of establishing precedents of this character. Sir, I am tired of talk of that sort. Has anybody hesitated, when the widows of Presidents have come here and asked for pensions—has Congress hesitated a moment to establish a civil list in their favor? And a citizen, however humble he may be, is entitled to the same consideration for his services as though his duties had been in a higher sphere of action.

This man did all he could for his Government, and in so doing he contracted the disease under which he now is suffering. I happen to know him personally. There is not a more worthy citizen in the United States to-day than this poor man who goes along day after day with this burden of disease upon him, contracted in the line of the most arduous and perilous duties.

I hope there will be no hesitation in recognizing his services and placing him where he properly belongs, upon the pension-roll of the Government. Indeed, I would be glad for one to vote to make his pension more than is proposed by this bill, for his services were not common services, but were very uncommon, extraordinary, gallant, perilous, and most deserving.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will ask the indulgence of the committee for one moment only on the question of what was the custom in the last Congress touching cases of this kind. I had the honor during the last Congress of serving on the Committee on Invalid Pensions with the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], the present chairman of that committee. A number of bills of this kind got through the committee and were placed on the Calendar. But when they came up for consideration, while I believe one or two did slip through inadvertently, the policy of the House in the last Congress, established and maintained to the end, was not to pension those who had not enlisted in the service. I know that occasionally, as I have said, some such bills were passed. But toward the close of the session, when the question was made that such bills had been passed, it was said that it had been done earlier in the session.

Any man who doubts what I say can get an old calendar of the last Congress—he can get a succession of calendars—and he will find that not simply one, not simply two, not simply three, but a dozen or two dozen, and I do not think I would be amiss if I were to say that more than two scores of bills in various forms proposing pensions for civilians are marked on those calendars in italics "passed over informally." We worked during the sessions for the consideration of pension bills without a quorum, and being unwilling that the precedent should be established of pensioning civilians, gentlemen protested that they would raise the question of a quorum if the bills were pressed. Hence meeting after meeting and month after month through both sessions of the last Congress, and until the Congress closed, the custom prevailed of passing over such bills informally; and the old calendar will show them so marked in italics.

That is all I desire to say concerning that point. As to whether this House shall vary that policy or not is with the House. I do not believe it is wise to change that policy; but if we do vary it, let members understand the circumstances under which it is done.

Mr. HOUK. The gentleman will not undertake to say that no bill of this character was passed.

Mr. McMILLIN. I said that in more than one instance probably such bills did pass through inadvertently. But I do say that the policy of the last Congress was not to pass such bills as this.

Mr. HOUK. Instead of its not being the policy of Congress, they were not passed because there was not a quorum here.

Mr. McMILLIN. And hence they could not be passed.

Mr. HOUK. Because we did not have a quorum here when they were under consideration.

Mr. McMILLIN. The point I make is that they were not passed by the last Congress.

Mr. HOUK. The fact that they were not passed because of the want of a quorum does not affect the policy of Congress.

Mr. STEELE. Would an amendment be in order to place all men engaged in military service upon an equal footing with those who were regularly enlisted?

Mr. MATSON. I would make a point of order on that amendment if offered.

Mr. NUTTING. This question appears to present three aspects, as I judge from the arguments which have been brought forward. One is that this man was not an enlisted man, and therefore it is argued that he is not entitled to this pension.

Now, if the Chair please, let me say that an enlistment, as I understand it, is in law and in fact simply a contract with the Government that the man enlisted shall perform for it certain services. It is a kind of contract. And I say that the contract with this man to perform certain services was as much a contract of enlistment, although a different kind of a contract, as any other; that is all. One man was enlisted for the purpose of performing certain duties in the Army; another man was enlisted by another contract to perform certain other duties.

If the policy of the last Congress was against establishing this kind of precedent, it is time that the precedent was established by this Congress. If a man perform services for the Government under a law such as this man performed under, then I say he is entitled to as much consideration at our hands as he would have been if enlisted under the regular enlistment law.

I say further that the kind of service which this man performed was particularly important to the Government. How many times was it, I ask the men here who were in the service, that the men in the ranks who were enlisted men waited with bated breath for the word to come that was to be brought by the men of this character of what was going on in the enemy's lines; waited until they had received word that they could perform the service for which they had been enlisted? When this man brings back word that the opportune time has come, that the attack may be made with effect, then the attack is made. The whole army waits for the service of this man. And when he has performed it, and has received disability in performing it, I say this Congress would be derelict in its duty did it not recognize the service and give the man under these circumstances a pension. [Applause.]

Mr. HORR. This bill, upon examination, proves to be more satisfactory in its form than I had supposed. It leaves this man to make his proof as to the amount of disability, just as any other applicant for a pension must do. He is to be subjected to the examination of the surgeons of the Government in the same way as an enlisted soldier would be if applying for a pension. The only question is whether a man who has incurred disability in this class of service should be put on the pension-rolls. Now, it does seem to me that enough has been said to satisfy any one that the character of the service rendered by this man was as important as that performed by many others who are now getting pensions.

I know that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] is right in his statement that there were but few cases of this kind passed in the last Congress; yet I do not think the line was as finely drawn as he draws it. Certainly I remember that at one evening session we passed bills to pension three nurses. I know that in several instances in the last Congress we passed bills placing on the pension-roll persons who had never been mustered in the military or naval service. At the same time it is true, as has been stated, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], then the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, opposed as a rule the granting of a pension in every such case. I recollect that our friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] worked early and late to get a bill passed pensioning a man in one of the exceptional cases. I do not remember what was the matter with the man; but I do remember that it appeared, when the gentleman got through his speech, that the man was a mere bundle of diseased muscles and veins, having lost almost everything that could make life valuable. But, as I recollect, we did not pension him.

Mr. McMILLIN. The disability alleged was that he had been injured in firing a salute. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House. [The question having been put]. The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 76, noes 8.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I make the point that no quorum has voted. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] My reason for making this point is that instead of pensioning civilians we ought to be pensioning the soldiers who have received honorable wounds in the service of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally.

Mr. BAGLEY. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBERTSON] to withdraw his point.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am willing to do so if the bill be laid aside without action.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside informally.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DUNHAM. I object.

Mr. McMILLIN. I hope that will be done. That was the course always taken in the last Congress in cases of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. MATSON, and the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. ROBERTSON.

Mr. CALKINS. I hope unanimous consent will be given that the bill be laid aside informally.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection was made.

Mr. MATSON. I appeal to the gentleman who made that objection to withdraw it. If it be insisted upon, it will prevent our reaching any other bill to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. THOMAS. It is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will take their places.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 12.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. No quorum.

Mr. MATSON. I now renew my request for unanimous consent that the bill be passed over informally. Unless this is agreed to, gentlemen prevent the reaching of any other bill to-night. Let this bill be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar; or, if it be more satisfactory to the opponents of the bill, I will make a proposition that it be reported to the House with the distinct understanding that it be disposed of by a yea-and-nay vote when we have a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS. I am entirely willing to agree to that.

Mr. DUNHAM. I object.

Mr. MATSON. I will undertake to see that there shall be no action upon the bill in the House except when there is a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] asks unanimous consent that the bill may be reported to the House——

Mr. ROBERTSON. I object.

Mr. MATSON. Then let it be passed over informally.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ROBERT M. FLACK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 3669) granting a pension to Robert M. Flack; reported with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Robert M. Flack, late captain of Company F, Eighty-fourth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

It appears that Robert M. Flack, late captain of Company F, Eighty-fourth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, having filed his claim with the Commissioner of Pensions and complied with the requirements of the law, and having fully proved his claim, it has been rejected on the grounds that he was not mustered into the service as captain at the time the disability was incurred.

While the claimant may not have a legal right to a pension in consequence of this omission in the records, he has an equitable one, and as he served faithfully as a brave soldier in the Army, and obtained his disability while in the line of duty, and, further, that his brother officers and comrades testify to his worth as a soldier, and the medical testimony shows that his disability is pensionable, therefore your committee feel that it is a meritorious case, and report in favor of the bill, and recommend that it do pass.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out these words: "and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 a month."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINANS, of Michigan. I move the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I should like to have a fuller explanation of this case. Was this man enlisted and injured as a private?

Mr. WINANS, of Michigan. He was commissioned by the governor of his State. He went into Kansas, and was there for three months. During that time he incurred disease, for which he applied for a pension, but was refused on the ground he was not mustered in before the occurrence of the disability.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Was he acting as a captain?

Mr. WINANS, of Michigan. He was commissioned by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

NELLY ROBERTS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1142) granting a pension to Nelly Roberts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nelly Roberts, dependent mother of Frederick Sawyer, alias Bond, late a private in Company G, First United States Colored Troops, and pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The committee are satisfied Nelly Roberts is very old, very poor, and appeals most strongly to our sympathy. She furnished four sons to the Federal Army, three of whom died in service. That she was entirely dependent upon her dead son, Fred. Sawyer, when he died, is not clear, but it is clear that but for his death she would now be entirely dependent upon him. She is now dependent on the charity of her old master, and is over seventy-five years old.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

DILENO ROBINSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 2251) to increase the pension of Dileno Robinson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Dileno Robinson, late a private in Company K, Second Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, be, and he is hereby, granted and allowed, from and after the passage of this act, a pension at the rate of $24 per month; and that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of said Dileno Robinson on the pension-roll at said rate in lieu of the pension now paid him.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

Dileno Robinson, of Lynn, Mass., a private in Company K, Second Massachusetts Volunteers, served from the 25th day of May, 1861, and including a re-enlistment, until the 14th day of July, 1865, when he was honorably discharged, his total period of service being four years, one month, and twenty days. He was granted a pension (certificate No. 75490) at the rate of $4 per month, December 21, 1866, which was increased June 12, 1867, to $8 per month, and upon April 7, 1875, was further increased to $10 per month. This was for injuries received to his side, back, and stomach while in line of duty with his regiment at Sisters Ferry, S. C., on or about February 1, 1865, by being knocked down and run over by a loaded army wagon, estimated to weigh between 3,000 and 4,000 pounds, two wheels of which passed over him. He claims that the injuries then received have resulted in heart, liver, and kidney troubles, dizziness, and daily pains through his entire body, and that the same are increasing as he grows older, until they have totally incapacitated him for the performance of any manual labor. The evidence in relation to his injury is Lieut. John A. Fox, adjutant of his regiment, who certifies, "It was thought at the time that Robinson was mortally injured."

Samuel F. Jepson, first sergeant of his company, certifies:

"I was an eye-witness of the accident, and helped carry him to a place of saftey. The blood was running from his ears, nose, and mouth. I did not think he would live an hour."

Dr. I. H. P. Shattuck, on duty in general hospital at Savannah, Ga., certifies:

"Robinson was brought to Savannah the latter part of January, 1865, in a very critical condition, and it was believed at that time by the surgeons at the hospital that he would live but a very short time."

Dr. George S. Jones, of Boston, Mass., examining surgeon, certifies:

"His present condition is evidently the result of severe internal injury. He is unable to perform any laborious duty."

Dr. John W. Foye, examiner, Boston, certifies:

"There is tenderness on pressure over the stomach, requiring the constant use of a protective bandage, and the slightest indiscretion in diet is followed by severe paroxysms of pain."

Dr. Isaac F. Galloupe, of Lynn, examining surgeon, certifies:

"Suffers from palpitation on exertion, and from pain in region of heart; can not lie on left side; is weak, tremulous, and easily fatigued, and since last examination by me these symptoms have increased in severity, and form the ground for increase of pension. Heart disease, result of injury to chest: disability permanent in its present degree; increase of disability not due to vicious habits; his claim for further increase of pension was rejected May 22, 1883, on the ground 'that he is now receiving the full amount allowed under the law for the disability resulting from injury to stomach.' This 'rejection,' he claims, does him great injustice; that his disability is equivalent to the loss of a hand or foot; that he can not perform any manual labor; and has been compelled for the last few years, in order to exist on the pension of $10 per month paid him, to live hermit-like in a shanty, which he had built for himself in Dungeon Pasture, so called, in the woods in the suburbs of Lynn, Mass."

Your committee are of the opinion that the case is fully sustained by the facts, and are therefore of the opinion that the relief sought should be granted, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. What were the circumstances under which he received this disability?

Mr. LOVERING. The circumstances under which the injury was received were these: The regiment came into camp at night and, as usual, the boys scattered for wood wherewith to start a fire to boil their coffee and cook their meal. He had gone with the others and obtained an armful of rails and he was bringing them in. Any one who has seen the sight knows the confusion attendant on such occasions. He was caught between two teams, knocked down, and run over.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

THERESA CROSBY WATSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 103) granting a pension to Theresa Crosby Watson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll of the United States the name of Theresa Crosby Watson, widow of James M. Watson, late a commodore in the United States Navy, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $50 a month from and after the passage of this act, subject to all the other provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

Commodore James M. Watson entered the United States naval service in 1823, and remained in said service until 1873, when he died in Vallejo, Cal. His health was seriously impaired in 1854, when, in command of a man-of-war, the Fulton, he was exposed to a severe storm, producing an attack of pneumonia, which, there is reason to believe, ultimately caused his death. His service was long and faithful and meritorious. His widow is now in the decline of life, and solely dependent on her exertions for support. We can see no reason why she should not receive the same pension that has been allowed in many other similar cases by special act of Congress to the widows of officers of the Navy of similar rank. The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know of the gentleman having this bill in charge why it is that this applicant can not receive a pension under the general law. If the facts stated in the report are true, it would seem to be hardly necessary to come here with this application.

Mr. HORR. Yes; I would like to know something about that myself.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, under the direction of the Committee on Pensions I reported this bill to the House, and in answer to the gentleman's question as to whether or not under existing law this claimant could receive relief, I have to say that, as we found the statutes, had Commodore Watson died in action, or from the direct cause of wounds received in the service, the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee would be a correct one, and there would have been no need for this bill. In the absence of that it is necessary that an act shall be passed to enable the widow to receive any assistance from the Government.

Since I am on my feet I desire to suggest to this committee that the relief sought by this bill for this person is such relief as by a report of the Commissioner of Pensions, which I hold in my hand, has been repeatedly extended to the widows of the officers of this rank in the Navy. For instance, in the case of Rear-Admiral Farragut the House in 1872 bestowed upon his widow a pension of $2,000 per annum.

The list of those that I shall now read is such a list as is furnished by the Commissioner of Pensions, where such pensions as this bill proposes are being paid at $50 a month, as follows:

To the widow of William M. Wood, a rear-admiral; of William Reynolds, a rear-admiral; of Henry H. Hoff, a rear-admiral; of Henry H. Bell, a rear-admiral; of Charles H. Davis, a rear-admiral; and so on down through quite a list of names of persons who are receiving pensions of that grade. Where the officer held the rank of commodore I find the names of James H. Frailey, a commodore; Charles S. McCauley, a commodore; Isaac McKeever, a commodore; and others, comprising ten or twelve instances, where pensions are being paid to their widows.

Further, I have to say that under the general pension laws as they existed up to the time of the enactment of the act of 1862 the widow of this officer, or the widow of an officer of like rank, would have received a pension at the rate of $50 a month. Under the act which went into effect in 1789 it was provided that the widows of officers of the Navy should, in case of the death or wounding of such officer in the service of the United States, receive a pension equal to half the pay of such officer. The half-pay of a captain—that being the highest officer recognized in the act—was $100 a month; so that the pay of the pensioner under that law would have been $50 a month, and so on through the range of the varying grades of rank down to the lowest.

That law remained in force from the time of its passage until 1862. The law of 1862 deprived the naval people of the advantage of that act and operated to reduce these pensions. But the law of 1862 only provides for officers of the rank of captain, and makes no provision for commodores, rear-admirals, or admirals so far as I can discover, and I have examined it closely and had experts to look it up. It provides that certain officers of the Army with a specified rank shall receive pensions at certain specified rates, and by analogy with that designation officers of the Navy are pensioned, or those dependent upon them, their widows, children, &c., at equivalent rates. There is no specific provision of law, so far as I have been able to discover, regulating the gratuity on the part of the Government to the survivor of an officer of the Navy of this rank. Hence the necessity for this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY SCHNETBERG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1410) granting a pension to Henry Schnetberg, of Indiana, Pa.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Schnetberg, late a private in Company B, of the Second Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, in the Mexican war, from and after the passage of this act, at the rate of $8 per month.

The report is as follows:

The petitioner asks to be placed on the pension-rolls on account of disease contracted in the service of the United States in the war with Mexico and in the line of duty.

The committee, after a careful examination of all the evidence, find that Henry Schnetberg was mustered into the service of the United States on the 3d day of January, 1847, as a private in said company and regiment, of which John Humphreys was captain; that said Schnetberg was promoted to first corporal in said company May 1, 1848; that in April and May, 1847, said Schnetberg with his company was encamped at Camp Patterson, near Jalapa, and that in consequence of the want of tents and the inclemency of the weather said Schnetberg, among others, became diseased, which in his case became chronic; that he then and there contracted rheumatism, which has clung to him ever since, and now in his old age (he being over eighty-four years of age) has crippled him so as to disable him from earning his living by manual labor; that he is poor and destitute of any means save the proceeds of his own labor. That a claim for pension under the general law was filed by him in 1875, but had to be abandoned because of his inability to prove the continuance of the disease as required by the general pension laws.

In the judgment of the committee the evidence fully establishes his claim, and they therefore report favorably, and report back the bill H. R. 1410, and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GENERAL WARD B. BURNETT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4682) granting a pension to Ward B. Burnett.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the pension for $72 per month granted to General Ward B. Burnett, a survivor of the war with Mexico, for total helplessness, by a certificate issued July 17, 1882, is hereby increased $28, which amount shall be paid to him in addition to the pension he now receives under the general law; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place his name on the pension-roll at the rate of $100 per month, this sum being allowed him for total blindness as well as for total disability.

SEC. 2. That the pension for $50 per month granted to General Ward B. Burnett by a special act approved March 3, 1879, is hereby repealed.

The report is as follows:

1. FACTS OF HIS MILITARY AND CIVIL HISTORY.

This distinguished veteran of five wars was appointed a cadet at West Point in the year 1828 by President Jackson, and he was graduated in 1832. He fought in the Black Hawk war in that year, on the ground where Chicago now stands, before a single house was built in that great city. In 1833 he reported to Winfield Scott during the nullification difficulty at Charleston, S. C. In 1835 he went through the Florida war. In 1842–'43 he organized a brigade, and offered his services to the President when war was anticipated with England over the Oregon boundary line. The brigade was kept together largely at his expense. In 1846, two regiments of his brigade having been accepted by Governor Wright, he was ordered to report with his regiment, the Eighteenth New York Volunteers, to Winfield Scott for duty in the Mexican war. He was engaged in the siege of Vera Cruz, and besides several lesser engagements, in the battles of Cerro Gordo, Contreras, and Churubusco, in which last-named battle he was severely wounded, and also injured by the fall of his horse, and he was carried thence on a litter to the City of Mexico two days after its surrender, where, from his wounds, his jaws were closed by tetanus or lock-jaw for a period of about forty-five days. He was promoted to be brigadier-general, to date from the surrender, September 14, 1847. On the following 30th of November he was tendered for his services in the war with Mexico a resolution of thanks by the Legislature of New York.

In 1861 he offered his services to President Lincoln, and in 1863 he opened a recruiting office in the assembly rooms in New York city, at his own expense, to aid in the organization and consolidation of regiments, under orders from the governor of New York, indorsed by President Lincoln. He rendered valuable service to the Government during the New York riots, when he had command of the city for a brief period, and he organized several commands in New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and Pennsylvania for service in the field during the late rebellion. From exposure consequent upon these labors he became a martyr to inflammatory rheumatism.

General Burnett has also rendered valuable services to the country as a civil engineer. In 1833, while upon duty at West Point, he made surveys, plans, and estimates for the Croton water-works in New York city. In 1835 he made surveys in Vermont, New Hampshire, and Maine for a railway line from Canada to the Atlantic seaboard. Thence he was ordered to Lake Michigan to construct harbors. For more than three years he was resident engineer of the Illinois and Michigan Canal. In 1849 President Polk offered to make him the commissioner to run the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, but being upon crutches, he was instead made chief civil engineer for the construction of a dry-dock at the Philadelphia navy-yard, which he completed in 1852. Thence until 1855 he was in charge of the New York dry-dock and of the construction of the workshops in the New York navy-yard. He made the plans of the Brooklyn water-works, which were adopted in that year. In 1857 he was made chief engineer of the Norfolk navy-yard and the Portsmouth water-works, which involved his survey of Lake Drummond. In 1858 he was made surveyor-general of Kansas and Nebraska, because from ill-health he was unable to accept the appointment offered him by President Buchanan of consul-general to Turkey.

2. FACTS RELATING TO HIS PENSIONS.

For wounds received in the battle of Churubusco, on August 24, 1847, and for chronic neuralgia, resulting therefrom, General Burnett was granted, from August 1, 1848, a pension of $30 per month. (Sec. 7, act of 13th May, 1846; sec. 2, act of 21st July, 1848; sec. 4730 U. S. Revised Statutes.)

On January 31, 1879, General Burnett petitioned Congress to increase his pension to $100 per month, for wounds, neuralgia, and rheumatism. March 3, 1879, Congress by special act increased it to $50 per month. (U. S. Stat., vol. 20, p. 665.)

April 12, 1879, he renewed his application for $100 per month, and for his relief Mr. Senator VOORHEES introduced a bill to grant him that amount. (S. Mis. Doc. No. 26, S. bill 477, Forty-sixth Congress, first session.)

March 10, 1880, the House Committee on Invalid Pensions reported favorably upon the bill introduced by Mr. Martin to increase his pension to $100 per month for total disability. The Congress died before the bill was reached on the Calendar. (House Report No. 485 upon bill H. R. 285, Forty-sixth Congress, second session.)

Congress, by general pension laws, has made exceptional provision for the care and maintenance of the totally disabled soldiers of the Republic, as follows: June 4, 1872, $31.25 per month; June 4, 1874, $50 per month; June 16, 1880, $72 per month.

In 1880, General Burnett, then a totally disabled soldier, applied for the benefits of these general pension laws to the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. Commissioner Bentley rejected his application, upon the ground that General Burnett was then receiving $50 per month under a special act of Congress and was thereby concluded in his rights, which action was approved by Mr. Secretary Schurz. President Hayes referred his case to Attorney-General Devens, but nothing was done. President Garfield next referred the application to Attorney-General McVeagh, and at his request Mr. Solicitor-General Phillips, on June 15, 1881, rendered an opinion in General Burnett's favor. But this opinion was not executed by the Commissioner.

President Arthur next referred the application to Mr. Attorney-General Brewster, who, on April 10, 1882, rendered a strong and favorable opinion upon the case of General Burnett, and on its reference to Hon. Henry M. Teller, Secretary of the Interior, he instructed the Commissioner of Pensions to carry out the opinion. On May 20, 1882, he executed a certificate to General Burnett for $72 per month from March 3, 1879. This certificate was declined, whereupon the Secretary of the Interior, on May 31, 1882, directed the Commissioner to issue a certificate for $72 from July 17, 1878. This was done on June 3, 1882, and under it General Burnett was paid all that the Commissioner adjudged to be due to him. As the pensioner claimed that more money was due to him, the Secretary, on June 24, asked advice from the Attorney-General as to what rates of pension should be paid from June 4, 1872, down to that date; and on June 29 the rates were stated by the Attorney-General.

On July 3, 1882, the Secretary asked the Attorney-General if the pensioner, in view of section 4715 of the Revised Statutes, was entitled to $72 per month, in addition to the $50 per month granted by the special act of March 3, 1879. The Attorney-General replied affirmatively, whereupon, on July 11, 1882, Mr. Secretary Teller sent the several opinions from the Department of Justice to Mr. Commissioner Dudley, with an order to execute them.

On that same day Mr. Senator VAN WYCK introduced a resolution into the Senate, directing the Secretary of the Interior to cease action upon General Burnett's case until Congress could pass a law forbidding him to pay the pensioner his accrued pension. This legislation was ingrafted upon a private bill passed July 17, 1882, granting a pension to Albert O. Miller; but it was subsequently tacked on to the pension appropriation bill of that year, as follows:

"SEC. 5. That no person who is now receiving or shall hereafter receive a pension under a special act shall be entitled to receive in addition thereto a pension under the general law, unless the special act expressly states that the pension granted thereby is in addition to the pension which said person is entitled to receive under the general law."

But approval of this law by the President was not made until July 25, 1882. On the 17th of July a certificate for $72 per month under the general pension laws, and another certificate for $50 per month under the special act, were executed to General Burnett, and under them he was paid, on July 20, the sum adjudged to be due to him under the decisions of the Attorney-General.

There was a discussion of this case in the Senate, reported as follows in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD: Tuesday, July 11, 1882, bound RECORD, page 5876; Friday, July 14, 1882, bound RECORD, page 6026; Saturday, July 15, 1882, bound RECORD, page 6077; Thursday, July 20, 1882, bound RECORD, page 6245; Saturday, July 22, 1882, bound RECORD, page 6343; Wednesday, August 2, 1882, bound RECORD, page 6759.

The following papers also pertain to this case: Senate resolution 94, July 11, 1882; Senate bill 2138, July 11, 1882; House bill 1543, December 16, 1881; report thereon No. 1021; House bill 1543, amended April 12, 1882; private act 169, approved July 24, 1882; S. Mis. Doc. 120, July 20, 1882; S. Mis. Doc. 121, July 20, 1882; pension appropriation law, section 5 (Public No. 176), approved July 25, 1882; S. Ex. Doc. 193, August 2, 1882.

As soon as payment was made to the pensioner, or on July 20, 1882, resolutions of inquiry were offered in the Senate requiring both the Secretary of the Interior and the Attorney-General to explain why they disobeyed the Senate, inasmuch as it had directed by a resolution of July 11 a suspension of proceedings in General Burnett's case pending the action of Congress upon the subject.

The petitioner at that time was of advanced years and in feeble health. He knew that the special-act certificate would die with him, and that no rights thereunder could survive to his good and faithful wife, whereas under the general pension laws she might hereafter claim his pension of the higher grade. The relator had had a hard struggle through nearly three long years to obtain his certificate, issued July 17, 1882. His case has been before three Presidents and three Attorneys-General, and it had been sent for opinions seven times to the Department of Justice. The anxiety consequent upon this struggle further and greatly impaired his health, which throughout a period of more than thirty-five years has been shattered by the effects of wounds and disease received in the military service of the United States. This struggle further broke the health of his devoted wife, which long since gave way in her sixteen years of ministering care upon this battle-scarred hero. The proceedings had in the last Congress worked great excitement and mental suffering upon the petitioner and upon his family. Their excitement added to his own.

It was in this frame of mind, apprehensive that Congress would deprive him of his greater pension, unable to consult his counsel, who was absent in the State of Maine during this entire hostile legislation, anxious to provide for his suffering family, and to secure their comfort as best he could in event of his death, then daily expected, that he offered to give up his special-act certificate until Congress in its bounty should restore it to him.

General Burnett made this conditional relinquishment July 21, 1882. On July 24 the President approved the Albert O. Miller special act, and on July 25 he approved the pension appropriation law. On July 31 the Secretary of the Interior made a reply to the Senate resolution of inquiry. (S. Ex. Doc. 193, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.)

Your committee is pleased to include in its report a portion of the officer's reply:

"The Secretary of the Interior is asked to furnish the Senate with his reasons for the issuing of such certificates for such double pension pending the action of Congress on the subject. The question as to what amount of pension General Burnett was entitled to receive had been submitted by the President of the United States to the proper officer of the Government, and such officer had determined that he was entitled to the pension of $50 per month and $75 per month, making a total of $122 per month. That there might be no mistake the Secretary of the Interior called for a review of that question. He found on file three carefully prepared opinions of the Attorney-General in favor of paying the pension to General Burnett.

"It can not be supposed that the President of the United States submitted the question in dispute between officers of the Interior Department and General Burnett to the Attorney-General for his opinion with the intention of ignoring such opinion if it was adverse to the ruling of the Department. And when doubts arose in the mind of the present Secretary of the Interior as to the proper administration of the law under the opinion of the Attorney-General, and he submitted the question to the Attorney-General, he did not intend to disregard his opinion if it should not be in accordance with his own. The Secretary of the Interior is of the opinion that the ordinary rules of propriety would have been grossly violated if he had refused to receive as the law of the case the law as enunciated by the Attorney-General. The question had passed beyond the control of the Interior Department by the action of the President in the first place, and secondly by the action of the Department.

"Pending the proceedings in the Department of the Interior with reference to the pension, a resolution was introduced into the Senate touching this matter. The Secretary of the Interior understood as a question of law that there could be no ground of controversy as to the right of General Burnett to all the pension-money that had accrued, and that any proceedings of Congress in relation to the pension heretofore granted him could not affect his right to receive the money that had accrued to him. These certificates had been withheld from General Burnett under what the law officer of the Government had declared was an improper ruling of the Department, and by the withholding of the certificates he had been deprived of the money due him. It was alleged that by such refusal to pay he had been greatly embarrassed and put to great trouble and expense. To enable him to receive that money it was necessary that he should have his certificates, which the Attorney-General has declared it was his right to receive.

"The Secretary of the Interior was also of the opinion that the due administration of the law of his Department did not require him to await the action of Congress to see whether the law might or might not be repealed; he understood it was his duty to execute existing laws, and not such as might be passed. If the words in the joint resolution, 'pending the action of Congress on that subject,' are intended as a declaration of the Senate that it is the duty of an officer charged with the speedy execution of the law to await the action of Congress when such law shall be assailed in either branch of Congress, it must be regarded as the enunciation of a new principle, and one of which the Secretary of the Interior confesses entire ignorance.

"To hold that an officer charged with the execution of a law must suspend action whenever that law is assailed in Congress would enable a single member to nullify the law during the session of Congress. The Department is charged with the distribution of large sums of money as pensions to those who have been declared by the competent authority created by law entitled to the same. It can not be supposed that when the statutes providing for such pensions are assailed the Secretary of the Interior will cease to pay such pensions and await the action of Congress. The administration of law must proceed until such laws are repealed by competent authority. This was the course pursued by the Secretary of the Interior with reference to the pension of General Ward B. Burnett, who has received only that adjudged to be his due."

October 4, 1882, General Burnett revoked his relinquishment of the special-act increase pension of $50 per month, and requested the Secrerary of the Interior to return his certificate therefor, surrendered July 21, his offer to relinquish never having been accepted by the Secretary or by Congress. October 18, the Secretary refused to return the certificate, whereupon, October 20, 1882, the petitioner filed in the supreme court of the District of Columbia a petition for a mandamus in order to compel a restoration of the certificate. The petition was there dismissed; but it was immediately carried on a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States (The United States ex relatione Ward B. Burnett, plaintiff in error, vs. Henry M. Teller, Secretary of the Interior, defendant, No. 1185, October term, 1882), where, on January 29, 1883, a final decision was made refusing the writ of mandamus (17 Otto, 64), and subsequently the court declined to review its decision.

In order that the facts of this case, as officially reported, may be fully understood, your committee refers to the full answers that were made to the Senate resolution of inquiry of July 22, 1882, by the Secretary of the Interior and the Attorney-General of the United States. (S. Ex. Doc. 193, Forty-seventh Congress, first session; S. Ex. Doc. 64, Forty-seventh Congress, second session.)

3. THE LAW BEARING UPON THIS CASE.

In deciding the case of General Burnett the United States Supreme Court, after its statement of the facts appearing of record, held:

"The right of the relator * * * has been effectually cut off by section 5 of the act of July 25, 1882—

"'An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

"'Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, namely:

* * * * * * *

"'SEC. 5. That no person who is now receiving, or shall hereafter receive, a pension under a special act shall be entitled to receive in addition thereto a pension under the general law, unless the special act expressly states that the pension granted thereby is in addition to the pension which said person is entitled to receive under the general law.

"'Approved July 25, 1882.'

"It was competent for Congress to pass this act. No pensioner has a vested legal right to his pension. Pensions are the bounties of the Government, which Congress has the rig ht to give, withhold, distribute, or recall, at its discretion. (Walton vs. Cotton, 19 Howard, 355.) Therefore the contention of the relator that, having received the pension of $72 under the general law, he is also entitled to the pension of $50 granted him by the special act is without ground to rest on.

"His pension certificate, issued under the special act, can be of no service to him unless he wishes to relinquish the pension of $72 under the general law, and fall back upon the pension of $50 granted him by the special act. But he expresses no such purpose. * * * He voluntarily surrendered his pension under the special act in order to receive the larger pension to which he became entitled on the passage of the general act of June 16, 1880. As he is not entitled to any pension-money upon the certificate under the special act which he voluntarily surrendered, unless he waives his right to receive the larger pension given him by the general law, which he does not do, a judgment that the certificate be returned to him would be futile. * * * The supreme court of the District was, therefore, right in refusing the writ of mandamus, and its judgment must be affirmed."

Inasmuch as the Supreme Court has formally declared that no pensioner has a vested legal right to a pension, resting that declaration upon the case of Walton vs. Cotton, in the 19th of Howard, your committee deem it proper to quote more at length from the opinion of a divided court to show what was decided in that case:

"The question in the case turns upon the construction of these statutes. Does a right construction of them give the pension due to the grandchildren of the deceased pensioner; and, if so, does the bounty extend to the representatives of his children, who died before his decease; or do the acts restrict the bounty to his children living at the time of his death? This last construction has been adopted and acted upon by the Government.

"This view is mainly founded on the considerations that on the death of the pensioner the bounty is given to the widow, and if he leave no widow, to his children; that it was a bounty of the Government, arising from personal considerations of gratitude for services rendered, is not liable to the claims of creditors, and should not be extended, by construction, to persons not named in the act.

"The pension is undoubtedly a bounty of the Government, and in the hands of an administrator of a deceased pensioner it would not be liable to the claims of creditors had the acts of Congress omitted such a provision.

* * * * * * *

"Congress from high motives of policy, by granting pensions, alleviate as far as they may a class of men who suffered in the military service by the hardships they endured and the dangers they encountered. But to withhold any arrearage of this bounty from his grandchildren, who had the misfortune to be left orphans, and give it to his living children on his decease, would not seem to be a fit discrimination of national gratitude.

* * * * * * *

"There can be no doubt that Congress had a right to distribute this bounty at their pleasure, and to declare it should not be liable to the debts of the beneficiaries. But they will be presumed to have acted under the ordinary influences which led to an equitable and not a capricious result. And where the language used may be so construed as to carry out a benign policy within the reasonable intent of Congress, it should be done."

The pension conferred by the act of June 4, 1832, and subsequent acts, brought for review before the Supreme Court in the case just cited, was purely a gift pension, for it was granted to officers of the Revolutionary war and to their children long after the services of the soldier had been rendered. It was given to all without reference to any disability whatever. It was as readily given to the hearty and hale survivor as to the one who had left his limb upon the battlefield. It was a bounty or reward given for services already rendered instead of services to be rendered.

Your committee reiterate here the views which it expressed in a former report (Forty-fifth Congress, second session, House Report No. 64, upon bill H. R. 257 to pension persons who served in the Mexican and other wars).

The history of our pension system shows that our Government from its inception to the present day recognizes two forms of pensions, invalid and gratuitous. Invalid pensions are such as have been and are granted to soldiers who were disabled or contracted disease in the line of duty while in the military service of the country. These pensions assume the form of a contract, whereby the Government agrees with the soldier at the date of his enlistment, in consideration of his enlistment and service, to pay him a pension upon the condition of his being disabled in the line of duty. The other form, gratuitous pensions, are defined to be a reward for military services rendered, and is an evidence of a nation's gratitude to its defenders.

The very first section of the pension laws revised and consolidated by the act entitled "An act to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873," approved June 22, 1874, and acts relating to pensions passed prior to and since that date, provides:

"SEC. 1639. If any person, whether officer or soldier, belonging to the militia of any State, and called out into the service of the United States, be wounded or disabled while in actual service, he shall be taken care of and provided for at the public expense."

With all respect for the highest judicial tribunal of this Government your committee submits that, if "no pensioner has a vested legal right to his pension," Congress should tear from the statute-books the guarantee of the Government of the United States which is expressed in section 1639.

The pensions of soldiers disabled in the line of duty are in no sense a gratuity, but are supported by contract made by the Government with them at the date of their enlistment, that if disabled they should have a pension. The consideration is the service and blood of the soldier. The parties were competent to contract. The subject-matter of the contract was neither in contravention of law nor of public policy, but was expressly authorized by law and promotive of the public good. It has every ingredient of a contract, as defined by all the law-books. The pension was predicated on the sole condition of the soldier's disability in the line of duty, and upon the happening of which condition the engagement of the Government became a perfect vested right, and was the property of the soldier as much as any bond which he may have held on the Government or other choses in action which he may have owned. This view of the nature of an invalid pension is supported by the opinion of that great and learned lawyer William Wirt. When Attorney-General, in 1825, in speaking of an invalid pension, he said:

"It is bottomed only on the single condition that the husband and father shall die in the service of his country, on the happening of which condition the public engagement becomes a debt, which is as much property of the widow and children as any bond which the deceased may have left them by his will."

Let this Congress decide if a pension to a wounded soldier can be repealed or withheld any more than the interest-bearing bonds of the Government, put out upon the market in order to raise money to carry on the war. Is the contract between the Government and the bondholder any more definite or completely executed than the contract between the Government (under section 1639 United States Revised Statutes) and the wounded soldier, whose performance on his side in specific terms has been legally and formally acknowledged by the Government by granting him a pension? As long as the purse and the sword must both contribute to preserve the Government, why should any benefit accrue to the purse when you deny it to the sword, which contributes its part in the face of death?

General Burnett has had two pension certificates issued to him, one under a special act of Congress and another under a general law. The Department, as it has done in other cases, might have merged both these certificates into one certificate for $122 per month, but it chose to issue two certificates. He drew both pensions for three years.

It is true that the United States Revised Statutes provide that—

TWO PENSIONS ARE NOT ALLOWABLE.

"SEC. 4715. Nothing in this title shall be so construed as to allow more than one pension at the same time to the same person or to persons entitled jointly."

The acts of one Congress can not bind a subsequent Congress; no law is binding upon it but the organic law of the land. Now, who will say that the Congress in 1879, notwithstanding section 4715, could not make an exception in the petitioner's case, and give him two pensions, or even three pensions, all at the same time?

It has been the custom, and, almost without exception, it has been the policy of the Government to pay a person but a single pension at one time.

But there was a notable exception in the case of the widow of Commodore Perry, who, upon advice of the Attorney-General, was granted two pensions at the same time. (6 U. S. Statutes at Large, 260, March 2, 1821; 3 Opinions, 158, November 3, 1836.)

There were good reasons why the widow of Commodore Decatur was refused a double pension. A general pension law, and also a special act of Congress for her benefit, were enacted March 3, 1837, which was the adjournment day of Congress; but the special act first became a law, as it was feared that the general law, needing amendment, could not be passed before the adjournment.

Under the special act Mrs. Decatur never had a favorable adjudication upon her claim. (3 Opinions, 200, April 11, 1837.)

The lady then went into court on a mandamus, but she failed; she carried her case to this court, but she failed here. (Decatur vs. Paulding, 14 Peters (1840), 497.)

But petitioner has a different case. A final and favorable adjudication was had upon his rights, and the money to pay him, such amount as the Executive should find due to him, has already been appropriated by Congress. The Executive, by issuing his two certificates, built a sure foundation for his title. (Marbury vs. Madison, 1 Cranch (1803), 137; McBride vs. Schurz, 12 Otto (1880), 378.)

The act of June 16, 1880, passed only for the totally disabled soldiers, provides that the pension of $72 per month shall be in lieu of all other pensions paid them by the Government of the United States.

But that law is applicable only to those soldiers who have drawn pension under one or more general laws. If these words, "All laws or parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed," had concluded the text of the law of 1880, even then it did not touch petitioner's special act of March 3, 1879. The only way to repeal a special law which confers benefits on a citizen for his services rendered to the Government, and under which rights have vested, if it can be done at all, is to repeal it by another special law—certainly not by implication. But Congress evidently meant, by enacting the following section, that a special pension law can not be repealed, except for fraud:

PENSIONS UNDER SPECIAL ACTS.

"SEC. 4720. When the rate, commencement, and duration of a pension allowed by special act are fixed by such act, they shall not be subject to be varied by the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws."

The Congress knew that the law of 1880 did not repeal the special act of 1879; otherwise, why did it pass the Albert O. Miller bill?

(Private—No. 169.)

An act granting a pension to Albert O. Miller, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Albert O. Miller, late a seaman on board the United States steamship Bienville; and that no person who is now receiving or shall hereafter receive a pension under a special act shall be entitled to receive in addition thereto a pension under the general law, unless the special act expressly states that the pension granted thereby is in addition to the pension which said person is entitled to receive under the general law.

Approved July 24, 1882.

Even this law did not, in the judgment of Congress, repeal petitioner's special act, for on the following day it passed a law which was intended to be still more of a general character, as follows:

[Public—No. 176.]

An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, namely.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 5. That no person who is now receiving or shall hereafter receive a pension under a special act shall be entitled to receive in addition thereto a pension under the general law, unless the special act expressly states that the pension granted thereby is in addition to the pension which said person is entitled to receive under the general law.

Approved July 25, 1882.

The Supreme Court has left the special act of March 3, 1879, in full force, though suspended in its operation for any period that General Burnett shall draw a pension upon his $72 certificate. The court distinctly stated that he became entitled to this larger pension on the passage of the general act of June 16, 1880.

Here comes to Congress for relief a bearer of the flag of the United States of America in foreign lands, whose regimental flag was the first one planted at the headquarters of Santa Anna at Cerro Gordo after the United States troops had captured the position held by the whole Mexican line, and which was the first flag planted on the elevated causeway opposite Portalis in the battle of Churubusco; who returned to his State the first American flag that was planted upon the castle of Chapultepec, even before the Mexican standard was hauled down from the plaza of the castle, and at the same moment when one of the Mexican generals surrendered his troops and the key to the enemy's position to the men of the First Regiment of New York Volunteers; by whose side is shown in the great painting of him now hanging in the City Hall in New York the national flag presented by General Winfield Scott to his regiment at the National Palace in the City of Mexico, in January, 1848, in honor of its gallant conduct through the war. Here comes the soldier who thus presented the flags of his country to his command at the island of Lobos, Mexico, in February, 1847, upon their knees repeating this oath from his lips: "No enemy shall capture these colors while our lives are spared to defend them." Here comes a companion of Daniel Webster, of Andrew Jackson, of Henry Clay, against whom was closed the doors of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Here comes the man who is the oldest living graduate of West Point, who became a general in the Mexican war. Of the fruits of his valor was a territory conquered by these United States in 1848 almost one-quarter in extent of its then existing area, which is now peopled by 1,500,000 souls, and which from its mines alone could pay our national debt.

Here comes the man who was honored as the bravest officer in the Mexican war, for by a vote of his comrades in arms he was awarded the gold box of President Jackson, which bears the following inscription:

[Front side.]

FEBRUARY 23, 1819.

Presented by the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of New York to Maj. Gen. Andrew Jackson, with the freedom of the city, as a testimonial of respect for his high military service.

[Reverse side.]

THE HERMITAGE, TENNESSEE, August 17, 1859.

Bequeathed

by Maj. Gen. Andrew Jackson "to that patriot of New York city who (should our happy country not be blessed with peace) should be adjudged by his countrymen to have been the most distinguished in defense of his country and our country's rights." And—under that bequest by the general voice of his brothers in arms to Bvt. Brig. Gen. Ward B. Burnett, colonel of the First Regiment of New York Volunteers in the late war with Mexico.

Awarded

ANDREW JACKSON, JR., Trustee.

Here comes, in his seventy-fifth year, a man who has become totally blind from the effects of wounds received in battle for his country upon a battlefield in a foreign land.

Your committee, believing that the present pension of $72 per month is inadequate to meet the wants of General Burnett, do hereby recommend and offer for passage the accompanying bill.

During the reading of the above report the following proceedings took place:

Mr. HORR (after the report had been partly read). I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of that lengthy report be suspended and that the bill be laid aside favorably. We have heard enough already to pension him two or three times.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have not heard enough yet to justify the raising of this pension from $75 to $100 a month.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that the further reading of that report be dispensed with.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the further reading of the report be dispensed with. I do this out of a desire to extend a favor to long-suffering humanity. We have heard enough.

Mr. STRUBLE. If it is in order I move that we have the Constitution of the United States read in this connection.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object to dispensing with the reading of this report.

Mr. WOOD. I do not think the gentleman from North Carolina is serious about that objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is not in order.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object. From his own showing, as exhibited in the report, General Burnett has received so many favors at the hands of the Government that I think there is no necessity for an increase of pension at this time. He began as a graduate of West Point to receive pay from the Government, and his pension has already been increased to $72 a month. That has been paid to him; and I think no necessity has been shown for increasing it further to the amount of $100.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

CLARISSA M'KEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2399) granting a pension to Clarissa McKee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Clarissa McKee, widow of William McKee, late a private of Company D, Second District of Columbia Volunteers, and who was honorably discharged at Clifborn United States hospital, November 13, 1862, on account of asthma, rheumatism, and general debility, and who continued an invalid until he died, December 1, 1878.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 2399, ask leave to submit the following report:

The certificate of the Adjutant-General states that William McKee, husband of Clarissa McKee, was mustered into the service of the United States, as a private, January 31, 1862, at Washington, D. C., in Company D, Second Regiment of District of Columbia Volunteers, to serve three years, or during the war, and that he was discharged November 13, 1862, because of chronic rheumatism of six months' standing.

The Surgeon-General's certificate shows that McKee was admitted to Cliffburne Barracks hospital, September 9, 1862, with disease as before stated.

John Ditmars, captain of company in which McKee served, testifies that the soldier was discharged because of asthma and chronic rheumatism, incurred while in the service and the line of duty.

Dr. Cross testifies that he treated the soldier for asthma and chronic rheumatism from about December 1, 1862, to about December 1, 1870; also states that he came home debilitated and generally broken down in health. He never after acquired good health. Said soldier's condition was such that he had no power or vital force to resist disease after leaving the Army. Dr. Cross again testifies, January 30, 1873, that when the soldier returned home from the Army his physical condition was such that he was unable to perform hard labor, and the disease which he contracted in the military service caused his strength to fail more every day up to December 1, 1870, and in his opinion resulted in his death. The evidence on file in the Pension Office shows the fact of his death. The certificate of examining surgeon shows that Dr. Cross, who makes the affidavit as to sickness and cause of death, is both competent and reliable.

Statement of George O. Halsey, of Newark, says that the widow is in poor health, and that of William B. Guild, that she is a poor, sickly woman.

Your committee are of opinion that William McKee contracted disease while in the service that caused his death, and that the widow's health and pecuniary condition is such that she should have relief.

They therefore recommend the passage of bill H. R. 2399, which places her name upon the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. MATSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "volunteers," in line 7, namely, these words: "and who was honorably discharged at Clifborn United States hospital, November 13, 1862, on account of asthma, rheumatism, and general disability, and who continued an invalid until he died, December 1, 1878.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. MARY M'LAUGHLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2393) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary McLaughlin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Mary McLaughlin, widow of Barney McLaughlin, late of Company I, Thirty-fourth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 2393, beg leave to submit the following report:

Mary McLaughlin, the petitioner, widow of Barnard McLaughlin, asks to be placed upon the pension-roll for services rendered by her husband during the late war. Barnard McLaughlin was enrolled as a private in Company I, Thirty-fourth Regiment, New Jersey Volunteers, April 8, 1865, and was mustered out April 8, 1866, and killed March 25, 1872, by falling into a vat of sulphate of copper, at Trenton, N. J., leaving six children under age. The claim that he contracted a disease from exposure while in Alabama doing picket duty by lying on the swampy ground is substantiated by the surgeons; and also that he was sick with intermittent fever, which resulted in an abscess of the right thigh, and that his leg became stiff, rendering locomotion difficult; he also suffered from general debility; was granted a pension of $8 per month, showing that the case was recognized as meritorious by the Pension Office. It is claimed the accident would not have happened but for the stiff knee, received in service and in the line of duty. But for the accident, due to the stiff knee, he might still be living, drawing his pension, and supporting his family.

Under the circumstances the committee think it a proper case for a favorable report, the death being traceable, indirectly, to disabilities received in the service of the United States, and therefore recommend the passage of bill H. R. 2393.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. ANN W. MULVEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2398) granting a pension to Mrs. Ann W. Mulvey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and conditions of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Ann W. Mulvey, mother of Francis S. Mulvey, late of Company D, Fifth New Jersey Volunteers; James W. Mulvey, late of Company D, Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers; and August J. Mulvey, late of Company D, Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers, all of whom died in the Army, and pay her an increase of pension to the amount of $24 per month, in lieu of $8 that she now receives; but nothing in this act shall entitle the said Mrs. Ann W. Mulvey to arrears of pension.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2398) ask leave to report:

The petitioner, Mrs. Ann W. Mulvey, asks an increase of her pension, in accordance with the accompanying bill, for good and sufficient reasons, as hereinafter stated. Her three sons enlisted in the Army and did service in the late war, two of whom were killed in battle and one died in hospital from wounds and exposure. One son lost his life at Chancellorsville. The battle in which the other was killed is not stated in the official papers, but the fact appears in letters and affidavits made by herself and others.

At the time of their enlistment her husband was an invalid, unable to earn his living, and the family was dependent entirely upon the sons for support. The ground upon which she received her pension was the case of the youngest son, Augustus, and is presented in detail. He enlisted as a drummer June 3, 1862, in Company D, Eleventh Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, and was discharged August 15, 1863. His particular disability was a sprain in the left shoulder and right breast, received at Falmouth, Va., and he was rendered thereby unfit for duty.

The surgeon's certificate states that he was discharged because of "advanced" tuberculosis, contracted after enlistment. The affidavit of Alexander N. Dougherty, surgeon and commander of the New Jersey Home for Disabled Soldiers, located at Newark, N. J., shows that he was treated for consumption from March 3, 1870, to April 11, 1870, on which last-named day he died, and he swears also that the disease was contracted in the service. Augustus was but seventeen years of age when he died. No pension was granted him, although application was made; but death occurred before claim was decided.

The case seems one of peculiar hardship. The mother and sons, it may be assumed, from an unselfish devotion to the country's cause, sacrificed themselves for its preservation. With a sick husband to care for, and her sons taking the risks of battle and of death for the small pittance received by the soldier, a bare maintenance for the destitute family, and the final total destruction of this mother's support, impresses the committee with the conviction that it would be but justice to grant her request, and therefore recommend the passage of bill H. R. 2398.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEELE. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that it is now about time for him to move that the committee rise.

Mr. MATSON. Let us get to the bottom of this page on the Calendar.

Mr. STEELE. Very well.

Mr. BENNETT. I am requested by my colleague from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] to state that he is detained from the House this evening by sickness.

MARGARET A. CASWELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2473) for the relief of Margaret A. Caswell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret A. Caswell, widow of Egbert H. Caswell, formerly of Company K, Thirty-fourth Regiment New York Infantry Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 2478, ask leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner is the widow of Egbert H. Caswell, whose certificate of discharge shows that he enlisted in the service of the United States in the late war on the 15th day of June, 1861, for two years, in Company K, Thirty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers, and that he was discharged March 21, 1863, at Philadelphia, Pa. The surgeon's certifiate pronounces one of his disabilities to be a fracture of the tibia while on duty at Bolivar Heights, by falling from a stone wall while engaged in drawing water for his company. The ankle frequently swelled and was at times very painful after walking or standing. At Fair Oaks, Virginia, May 31, 1862, he received wounds in battle still more serious. J. J. Woodward, United States Army surgeon, testifies that at this time Caswell was disabled by a gunshot wound in the left leg, and also in the right thigh, and that he was rendered deaf in the right ear by reason of the bursting of a shell near that organ. He was forced to use crutches for several months after his discharge. He also received a bayonet thrust through the palm of his right hand.

For his several wounds he was treated in hospitals at Philadelphia and Washington; was reported by his physicians as having partial paralysis of the leg, and that he died, finally, from softening of the brain. It is a fair inference that this result was superinduced by exposure in the service and wounds received, but more directly from the bursting of the shell, which may have caused concussion of the brain. Your committee are of the opinion that he died from the causes before stated, directly traceable to his service, and think his widow should receive some aid from the Government in the form of a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of bill H. R. 2473.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JUDITH LAUTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2400) for the relief of Judith Lauter; reported with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to direct the payment to Judith Lauter, widow of Anton Lauter, late a private in Company E, First Regiment New York Cavalry, and who now holds certificate No. 165077, of a pension at the rate of $8 per month, from the date of the discharge of her husband, Anton Lauter, to the 2d day of September, 1869, the date of his death, as though he had applied therefor during his lifetime.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word cavalry, in line 6, in these words:

"And who now holds certificate numbered 165077 of a pension at the rate of $8 per month from the date of the discharge of her husband, Anton Lauter, to the 2d day of September, 1869, the date of his death, as though he had applied therefor during his lifetime."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Of a pension of $16 per month in lieu of the pension of $8 per month which she now receives."

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 2400, ask leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner, widow of Anton Lauter, asks Congress to grant an increase of her pension to $16 per month. She was granted a pension of $8 per month, and the circumstances under which she obtained such pension are as follows:

Anton Lauter enlisted July 20, 1861, in Company E, First Regiment New York Cavalry, and was discharged August 7, 1862. He died in 1869, since which time the pension as above stated has been paid. The soldier was injured at Alexandria, Va., in 1862, while at drill, by his horse falling, throwing the rider under him. The accident was severe, and Lauter was not able to return to his regiment. John Adams testifies that he knew Anton and Judith Lauter twenty-one years; that Anton was a healthy man when he entered the service; that he saw him the day he came home from Army hospital in 1862, and that he was then feeble and suffering from diarrhea; that he then lived in deponent's house from the time of his discharge until he went to the New York almshouse hospital, Ward's Island, in 1869, and was sick all the time; and that he did no work after leaving the Army. The proof is positive as to the disability, and the pension was therefore granted. Mrs. Lauter is now seventy-seven years old, and applies for increase of pension because of her impoverished condition and inability to support herself, claiming that the pension of $8 per month is insufficient. As this widow can be properly classed one of the wards of the Government, and is of extreme age, without means of support, it seems that justice requires that she should be cared for, and the committee therefore recommend the passage of bill H. R. 2400, with amendments.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

GEORGE F. DRESSER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1065); reported with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of George F. Dresser, formerly a private in Company A, Thirty-fifth Regiment New York State Volunteers, at the rate of $30 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The amendment of the committee was as follows:

Strike out all after the word "month," in line 7, namely, these words: "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 1065, begs leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner, George F. Dresser, enlisted in the service of the United States

September 14, 1861, as a private in Company A, Thirty-fifth Regiment New York Volunteers, and was honorably discharged on the 14th day of September, 1863. At the battle of Fredericksburg, Va., December 13, 1862, he was wounded by a shell, before exploding, his left leg being nearly cut off, and it was subsequently amputated by reason of said wound. At the same time he was seriously wounded in the left foot. He was sent to Saint Elizabeth Hospital, Washington, and was discharged, as above stated, on the 13th day of September, 1863. The petitioner is unable to wear an artificial leg, the stump being so short as to render it impracticable to strap or bind the same so as to keep it in position. It was repeatedly tried and finally abandoned, and he is obliged to walk with crutches. Was first allowed a pension of $8 a month from the time of his discharge, which was increased June 6, 1866, to $15, and afterward, on the 10th day of July, 1872, to $18. The proofs in the case are complete, and there is no question raised as to the disability or of the fact that he is unable to perform manual labor. The committee think it a proper case for an increase of pension, and therefore recommend the passage of House bill 1065.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee rise and report to the House the bills on which action has been taken.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the pension bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report with favorable recommendations sundry bills, some with and some without amendment.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole, without amendment, were then taken up, severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 432) to increase the pension of Joseph B. Sellers;

A bill (H. R. 1897) granting a pension to Catherine Hunter;

A bill (H. R. 2979) granting a pension to Nancy Ellis;

A bill (H. R. 1076) granting a pension to Miles B. Farlin;

A bill (H. R. 2419) granting a pension to Robert Nutt;

A bill (H. R. 1142) granting a pension to Nelly Roberts;

A bill (H. R. 2251) to increase the pension of Dileno Robinson;

A bill (H. R. 103) granting a pension to Theresa Crosby Watson;

A bill (H. R. 1410) granting a pension to Henry Schnetberg, of Indiana, Pa;

A bill (H. R. 2393) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary McLaughlin;

A bill (H. R. 2398) to increase the pension of Mrs. Ann W. Mulvey; and

A bill (H. R. 2473) for the relief of Margaret A. Caswell.

WARD B. BURNETT.

The bill (H. R. 4682) granting a pension to Ward B. Burnett, reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment, was then taken up.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] that this bill be passed over for the present. I would ask who has the bill in charge?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The bill is in charge of the gentleman from New York, Mr. ROBINSON.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask that the bill be allowed to lie over for the present.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I have no objection.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The report in this case shows that this party was paid last year in opposition to law.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the bill will lie over and come up as unfinished business on Friday next, or not before that time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was accordingly passed over informally.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendments, were then taken up, the amendments agreed to, and the bills as amended severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 3669) granting a pension to Robert M. Flack;

A bill (H. R. 1025) granting an increase of pension to Sarah Dayton, widow of Erastus G. Dayton;

A bill (H. R. 2399) granting a pension to Clarissa McKee;

A bill (H. R. 2400) for the relief of Judith Lauter; and

A bill (H. R. 1065) granting a pension to George F. Dresser.

Mr. MATSON. I move to amend the title of the last bill so as to make it read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to George F. Dresser."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House now adjourn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 1, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. 698) to authorize the construction of additional steel vessels for the Navy.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONVERSE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. OATES. I rise to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

FENCING IN PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. OATES. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back with an amendment the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House whether or not any portion of the public domain in the State of Nebraska has been fenced in for any purpose whatever by any individual, corporation, or company, and especially by the Brighton Ranch Company of Custer County, and whether or not by such fencing in any post-route of the United States has been obstructed or interfered with.

Resolved further, That if it be true portions of the public domain have been so fenced in, to inform the House upon what authority, if any, the same was done; and what steps have been taken on the part of the Government to cause the removal of such obstructions and the criminal prosecution of the offenders.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the resolutions calling on the honorable the Secretary of the Interior for certain information with reference to the fencing in of any portion of the public lands in the State of Nebraska, &c., have had the same under consideration, and report the same back to the House with a recommendation that the same be amended by striking out the second resolution and substituting therefor the words "and also whether any of the public lands in any other State or Territory have been fenced in by any person, firm, or corporation without authority of law, and what measures, if any, have been adopted by his Department in relation thereto;" and thus amended the committee recommend their adoption. Your committee made sufficient investigation to discover the importance of the information sought. The amendment is recommended for two reasons, namely: First, the second resolution presupposes the existence of a law under which persons who fence up or inclose public lands may be punished criminally, which is not the fact; and, secondly, the substitute for said resolution is recommended for the reason that your committee deem a more extensive inquiry and fuller information than the first resolution calls for.

Mr. BLANCHARD. As the introducer of the resolution now reported back, I am willing to accept the amendment proposed by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot accept it; the House must dispose of it. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment proposed in the report just read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. OATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. RANDALL. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to submit the report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the following resolution, namely:

"Resolved, That the second and fourth Mondays of each calendar month hereafter during the continuance of the Forty-eighth Congress, after the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions, be, and the same are hereby, set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on the District of Columbia"— having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

That the said resolution, if adopted, will restore a portion of Rule LXXXII of the Forty-third Congress, which assigned the third Monday of each month to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which rule was dropped in the revision of the rules in the Forty-sixth Congress. It was believed that under the said revision full opportunity would be afforded the said committee to dispose of all necessary business relating to the District of Columbia. This proved not to be the case, and in the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses orders similar to the foregoing were adopted. The committee are of opinion that this order should be made; and therefore report back the said resolution and recommend its adoption.

Mr. RANDALL. The report just read makes a full and complete statement of the object of this proposed amendment of the rules. I therefore call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution reported by the Committee on Rules was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTRA COPIES OF BILLS, REPORTS, ETC.

Mr. REED. The Committee on Rules, to which was referred a resolution introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] in regard to the printing of additional copies of bills and other public documents, have directed me to report back the same with an amendment in the form of a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The resolution as referred to the committee will first be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules be amended by the adoption of the following: Motions to print additional numbers of any bill, report, resolution, or other public document shall be referred to the Committee on Printing, and when the committee shall report in favor of printing additional numbers, the report shall be accompanied by an estimate of the probable cost thereof, and when the cost of printing such additional numbers shall exceed the sum of $500, the concurrence of the Senate shall be necessary for the order to print the same.

The SPEAKER. The report of the Committee on Rules will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution relating to printing, submitted by Mr. SCALES, January 24, 1884, have had the same under consideration, and report that in their opinion the accompanying additional rule should be adopted in place of the proposition submitted:

RULE XLVI.

Motions to print additional numbers of any bill, report, resolution, or other public document shall be referred to the Committee on Printing; and the report of the committee thereon shall be accompanied by an estimate of the probable cost thereof.

Mr. REED. The whole gist of this proposed rule is to be found in the last clause, requiring the Committee on Printing to submit an estimate of the cost of every matter on which they make a report.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is that the only change which this proposition will make?

Mr. REED. That is all.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is right.

Mr. REED. I call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment proposed by the Committee on Rules to the resolution was adopted.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. REED moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution as amended was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INQUIRY FOR EXECUTIVE INFORMATION.

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to a question of privilege. Two weeks ago I introduced a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, calling for executive information to be used during the discussion of the naval appropriation bill. Under clause 1 of Rule XXIV such resolutions are required to be reported back within one week. That resolution has not been reported. I do not desire this morning to move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; I merely call attention to the matter, so that the committee may take up the resolution and report upon it as soon as possible.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not think that resolution came to our committee.

Mr. CALKINS. It was referred two weeks ago.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is the gentleman sure that it went to the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. I assure the gentleman that we will consider the matter and report the resolution at once.

EXPENSES OF COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MONEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized to pay out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives the expenses incurred by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in the investigation ordered by resolution of the 25th ultimo.

Mr. MONEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OSCAR EASTMOND AND JAMES W. ATWILL.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 368) for the relief of Oscar Eastmond and James W. Atwill be taken from the Speaker's table for reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WILLIE S. HOWARD.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Willie S. Howard, authorized to be employed as a page of the House and assigned to duty with the subcommittee on appropriations, under resolution of February 27, 1884, be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the same compensation as other pages of the House from the date of his appointment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to inquire whether this matter has been examined by a committee. If so, I have no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution authorizing the appointment of this page was examined and favorably reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DOCKERY. This resolution providing for the compensation of this page has the approval of the Committee on Accounts.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. DOCKERY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the act of Congress approved January 16, 1883, entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," the Civil Service Commission has made to the President its first annual report.

That report is herewith transmitted, together with communications from the heads of the several Executive Departments of the Government respecting the practical working of the law under which the commission has been acting.

Upon the good results which that law has already accomplished I congratulate Congress and the people, and I avow my conviction that it will henceforth prove to be of still more signal benefit to the public service.

I heartily commend the zeal and fidelity of the commissioners and their suggestion for further legislation, and I advise the making of such an appropriation as shall be adequate for their needs.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 29, 1884.

SWINE PRODUCTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a report of the Secretary of State, accompanying a report made by the commission lately designated by me to examine and report upon the asserted unhealthfulness of the swine products of this country. The views and conclusions of the commission deserve the most careful consideration of Congress, to the end that if any path be legitimately open for removing the prohibition which closes important foreign markets to those products it may be followed, and appropriate legislation devised.

I earnestly recommend that Congress provide for reimbursing the expenses incurred by the commissioners in this praiseworthy service, and I should be glad also if some remunerative recognition of their public-spirited action in accepting the onerous and responsible duties imposed on them were to suggest itself to Congress. At all events, in view of the conflicting theories touching the origin and propagation of trichiniasis, and the means of isolating and extirpating it among domestic swine, and considering the important bearing which precise knowledge on these points would have on the commercial aspects of the matter, I recommend provision for special research in this direction.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 29, 1884.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

OFFICERS UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back the resolution of inquiry submitted by the gentleman from Indiana and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish to the House immediately the following information:

I. The number of commissioned and warrant officers who at the date of the compilation of the last Naval Register were employed on sea-duty, the statement to specify the number in each grade and to show the number on each ship.

II. The sea and shore service and unemployed time of the commodores during the last ten years, including a full, specific statement of all sea-service.

III. A list giving, in order of rank, the name of every commissioned and warrant officer at the date mentioned on shore-duty, with a description of the service on which he was employed, supplemented by a recapitulation giving the numbers at each navy-yard and each other locality, and a further statement giving the names and number of the officers on shore-duty in Washington, with a memorandum of the service on which each was employed.

IV. A statement of the number in each grade of commissioned and warrant officers who at the same date were not upon sea or shore duty.

V. A statement showing the names of the sea-going officers who, having held their present commission more than three years, have not had more than one year's sea-service under such commissions, with the amount of sea-service in each case.

The Secretary is also requested to inform the House whether he has complied with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, requiring him to certify in all orders for shore-duty that the same are required by the public interests, and to specify the term of service, and whether or not the number of officers now so employed can be reduced without injury to the public service; and what total number of officers on such duty will probably be sufficient during the next fiscal year, unless extraordinary emergencies should arise.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to state to the House that almost every point of information asked for by this resolution can be found in the current Naval Register, which can be had by every member of Congress upon application. Every solitary point embodied in that resolution, with one single exception, is set forth in extenso in the Naval Register of this year, and that is the point with reference to whether the Secretary has complied with the act of Congress requiring him to certify as to the necessity of detailing naval officers for civil or shore duty. I make that statement merely without the intention of objecting to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. COX, of New York. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] I wish to say that the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] was considered by the committee, I think, before the Register came into our hands. But it will do no harm. The Department can furnish this matter already in print by simply referring to the printed page; and as to the rest of the information required it can be very easily furnished in one day.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask unanimous consent that it be understood that during the rest of this day there be debate only.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. HUTCHINS objected.

The motion of Mr. HUTCHINS was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CONVERSE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes. When the committee was last engaged on the consideration of this bill the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] had been recognized, and he is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, this is the regular annual naval appropriation bill, and in calling attention to it and its various provisions I desire to say that the provisions of bills of this kind ought, as a rule, to be confined to making appropriations only, and should not contain measures of general legislation.

To the Committee on Naval Affairs, having jurisdiction of that branch of the service, I think ought to be committed all questions, excepting alone appropriations, relating to the Navy. Unhappily, under the rules of this House, the Committee on Appropriations has for some time exercised an all-controlling power as well over the personnel as over the vessels and ordnance of the Navy. Under these rules it seems to have been impossible to bring forward in the House and have passed any general bill rectifying the incongruities, inconsistencies, and useless features of the American Navy, and all that has been done for a number of years has been to interject small provisions here and there in the general appropriation bills until we find the Navy of the United States in all its branches and departments in a most anomalous condition.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, through one of its members, has been informed that the official personnel of the Navy of the United States now consists of 1,562 officers of various grades, running from Admiral of the Navy to naval cadets. We have in that list the Admiral, Vice-Admiral, rear-admirals, commodores, captains, commanders, lieutenant-commanders, lieutenants, ensigns, and naval cadets. Those grades cover either directly or indirectly all the officers of the Navy, both line and staff; as the staff officers have what is known as relative rank, and they are in fact, so far as pay and epaulets are concerned, commander, commodore, or other officer, whether they be doctors, ministers, engineers, paymasters, marines, or line officers of the Navy. I have never yet been able to understand or find any sufficient excuse for the conferring by Congress upon the different staff grades of the Navy the ponderous, exalted, and oppressive titles by which they are known. A surgeon in the Navy should be called a surgeon; a paymaster called a paymaster; a chaplain called a chaplain. And so far as rank is concerned, I believe that that term should apply only to officers who perform legitimate naval duty. Neither the paymaster, the surgeon, the chaplain, nor the engineer is required to have any special military training in order to qualify him for the full and complete discharge of his duties as assistant to the commanding and executive officers of the ship. A young man just out of a commercial college or a bank or any business house, with a very little training and information as to the details of his duty, may become a paymaster, and can discharge all the duties that devolve upon him on shipboard or on shore. There is no military training necessary to fit a surgeon for the discharge of his duties on shipboard or on shore. Then why a paymaster should be a commodore or a captain, why he should have relative rank, or why a minister of the gospel, the follower of that meek and lowly One who had not where to lay His head, should go about the earth on the vessels of this magnificent Navy of the United States decorated with gold lace, fine uniform, splendid epaulets, and high rank, is something I have never been able to understand, and is not in keeping with the honorable and sacred calling he has chosen as the mission of his life.

Still we find that various amendments have crept in upon appropriation bills in behalf of that class of officers, and we find pressure coming from every hand on the part of staff officers for position, rank, and more pay. And I shall not be surprised if this anomalous state of affairs goes on until we see an engineer, a most useful servant on board a steamship, admitted to the rank of commodore. Let us see what the condition of affairs would be if that should come about. An engineer in the Navy is simply one of the aids or assistants to the commanding officer. Under the law as it is, and under naval usage as it has been from time immemorial, a staff officer can under no circumstances take command of a naval ship. Now, suppose the vessel is in charge of a captain or a commander of the line, if you please, who is responsible not only for the officers under him but for the conduct of the men and for the safety of his ship. Suppose he should be killed. The next man is his executive officer. Then comes the navigator, and the watch officers, and so on down to the naval cadet making his first cruise. If the line officers above the naval cadet should be swept away one by one, by disease, accident, or death, and the naval cadet alone was left, he would of necessity have command of the vessel, and would stand on the bridge or occupy the captain's cabin and give orders to the "commodore engineer" before he could start or stop the engines of the vessel.

We tolerate these things, and we tolerate them, too, without any justification or excuse. I do not know that I remember the exact number of such officers now on the Naval Register. If I am not mistaken we have 14 medical directors, 15 medical inspectors, 50 surgeons, 79 passed assistant surgeons, 8 assistant surgeons, and 2 surgeons not in the line of promotion. Then we have 13 pay directors and 12 pay inspectors. We have quite a number of naval engineers, or chief engineers, as they are called.

I want to call the attention of the House to one or two things in connection with these pay directors and pay inspectors, these medical directors and medical inspectors. They are performing very little sea service, indeed. Yet there are but two States in this Union whose governors receive as much pay as these officers. There are only about three States in the Union that pay the judges of their supreme courts as much as is paid by this Government to the pay directors and pay inspectors and to the medical directors and medical inspectors of our Navy. They are kept on the Navy Register to-day simply as medical and pay ornaments, and very dear ones they are, indeed.

It is said that they have rendered efficient service in years gone by. That is true. But shall we continue to keep them on the Naval Register at great pay—at probably not too high pay if you continue to maintain their rank, but at very large pay when it is considered that we have no earthly use for them?

That which strikes me with the greatest force, and to which I call the attention of the House, is, that these high-rank officers of the staff corps receive a great deal more pay than line officers of corresponding rank who command them. Look at this table:

TABLE A.—Showing average pay and length of service of officers of same rank in each corps of the Navy, January 1, 1884.

	Waiting orders	600

From the above table we find that officers of the staff having the relative rank of captain, for they have only relative rank, receive more pay than a captain of the line on all except sea-duty. A captain of the line on sea-duty receives $4,500 a year, while the staff officers of corresponding rank serving under him receive as follows: Medical officer, $4,400; pay officer, $4,400; engineer officer, $4,400; and the marine officer, $4,500.

On shore-duty a captain of the line receives $3,500 a year; the medical officer, $4,000 a year; the pay officer, $4,000 a year; the engineer officer, $4,000 a year; and the marine officer, $4,500 a year. On waiting orders the line officer receives $2,800 a year; the medical officer, $3,000 a year; the paymaster, $3,000 a year; the engineer, $3,000 a year; and the marine officer, $4,500.

So we see in that one grade of captain on every kind of duty excepting sea-service alone the staff officers receive $500 a year more than the officer who would have command of the ship. And in the case of the marine officer, he receives $4,500 a year on all kinds of duty, while the captain of the ship on waiting orders receives only $2,800 a year.

Now come the commanders. We find that a commander of the line receives, on-sea duty, $3,500 a year; the medical officer, $4,400 a year; the pay officer, $4,400 a year; the engineer officer $4,400, a year; and the marine officer, $4,000 a year. On shore-duty a commander of the line receives $3,000 a year; the medical officer, $3,893 a year; the pay officer, $4,000 a year; the engineer officer, $4,000 a year; and the marine officer, $4,000 a year. So it runs all the way through, the staff officer receiving from $500 to $1,500 a year more pay than the line officer, who has to be responsible not only for the ship and the men, but also for these staff officers, whom he commands.

I say this is an outrage; one that is wholly unjustifiable, entirely inexcusable, and not warranted either by the services they perform or by any consideration that can be imagined by the mind of man.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. THOMAS. With pleasure.

Mr. REED. Do not the line officers, when they reach their highest promotion, ultimately get more pay than the staff officers do?

Mr. THOMAS. No; there are only two legitimate grades in the Navy to which, under the present law, the staff officer may not attain. But, taking into consideration the amount of pay they receive during the time they are in the service, the staff officers receive more pay than any line officer ever does during the same length of service. Out of two hundred line officers, on an average three only will reach the grade of rear-admiral. A staff officer of any one of the corps receives considerable more money than either of the three line officers who may reach the highest grade, to say nothing of the two hundred and ninety-seven line officers who never can reach the grade of rear-admiral.

Mr. REED. You are now talking of the present stagnant condition of promotion in the Navy, are you not?

Mr. THOMAS. I am talking about the Navy as it stands to-day.

Mr. REED. Yes, as it stands to-day.

Mr. THOMAS. I am speaking of the Navy as it stands to-day. We have now 1,562 officers in the Navy. I have not a word to say against one of them, for there is not a more accomplished set of men, whether of the line or staff, in the employ of any government in the world. They are accomplished, gallant, and brave, and ready to do service if only given an opportunity. We have naval officers enough for seventy vessels, while we have only thirty-one vessels in commission. According to the present estimates made by the Secretary of the Navy, and according to the estimate made by the advisory board (with Admiral John Rodgers, now dead, at its head), which had the subject under consideration, we have officers enough for seventy vessels. We have now fifty-nine officers for every ship in the service.

I am not going to ask to cut down the official naval personnel, whether of line or staff, but I do think it right that the pay of the line and staff should be equalized, and I am in favor of equalizing up rather than down. I believe every one must admit that common justice demands that the pay of these officers should be equalized. A doctor or an engineer or a chaplain—a "sky-pilot" as the sailors sometimes irreverently call him—should not receive more pay than the captain.

Mr. REED. The line officers are like members of Congress, they make up in glory what they fail to receive in money.

Mr. THOMAS. In the present condition of our Navy they will have to wait a long time for the glory.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will my colleague on the committee state how many officers there are to each seaman?

Mr. THOMAS. One officer to every five seamen, I believe. I can answer the gentleman with certainty if he will wait a moment till I refer to my papers.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will not ask the gentleman to look over his papers now. My remark was only designed to illustrate the top-heavy character of our remarkable Navy.

Mr. THOMAS. According to an official statement of the Secretary of the Navy, made to me in a letter which I now hold in my hand, there is one officer in the Navy for every five men. This table, which I have prepared with great care, shows the differences in the pay of the line and staff for different periods of service.

Mr. MCADOO. Can a medical director go to sea except as the medical officer of a fleet?

Mr. THOMAS. If you could run a lighter or barge alongside of him and hoist out a part of his cargo of rank he might be able to go to sea. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCADOO. There are fifteen medical directors.

Mr. THOMAS. But at present there is not one ship in the United States Navy with tonnage enough to carry a medical director, a pay director, or a chief engineer.

There are very few of these officers of high rank in the staff corps who are performing or can, on account of excessive rank, perform any sea-duty at all.

TABLE C.—Showing percentages of each corps of the Navy on sea-duty, shore-duty, &c.

It will be seen by this table that of the line officers there are 55 per cent. at sea or performing sea-duty, 35 per cent. performing shore-duty, and 9 per cent. on leave or waiting orders. Of the Medical Corps there are 46 per cent. at sea, 44 per cent. on shore-duty, and 10 per cent. on waiting orders. Of the Pay Corps there are 34 per cent. at sea, 41 per cent. on shore duty, and 25 per cent. on waiting orders. Of the Engineer Corps there are 47 per cent. at sea, 34 per cent. on shore-duty, and 15 per cent. on waiting orders. Of the Marine Corps 36 per cent. are at sea, 58 per cent. on shore duty, and 6 per cent. on waiting orders.

As answering one of the inquiries contained in the resolution offered by the chairman of the committee a few moments since, reference to which seems to be appropriate here, I desire to call the attention of the committee to another table which I have prepared, in condensed shape, so that members of the House, by looking at it, may be able to see exactly the present condition of the official personnel of the Navy and what the various officers are doing:

By this table it will be seen that of the rear-admirals there are 3 performing duty at sea, 3 on shore-duty, and 1 on leave or waiting orders; of commodores there are 3 at sea, 14 on shore-duty, and 4 on leave or waiting orders; of captains there are 12 at sea, 25 on shore-duty, and 9 on waiting orders; of commanders there are 25 at sea, 42 on shore-duty, 18 on waiting orders, and 1 under suspension; of lieutenant-commanders 36 are at sea, 28 on shore-duty, and 10 on waiting orders.

I will not take time to run through the various grades, &c., as shown by the table, but will give the total of each of these branches of the service. There are 418 line officers at sea; 268 on shore-duty; 72 on leave or waiting orders, and 3 under suspension. The total number of the line is 761. Number to be reduced under the act of August 5, 1882, 620.

I now invite attention to the medical officers of the Navy, a part of the staff corps; and in doing this I wish to refer to the naval appropriation bill, which provides for the pay of 14 medical directors and 15 medical inspectors. Of these medical directors there is not one at sea. There are 12 on shore-duty, and 3 on leave or waiting orders.

Mr. TALBOTT. If these officers were performing sea-duty, how much more money would the Government have to pay them?

Mr. THOMAS. The Government would not have to pay one cent more.

Mr. TALBOTT. Oh, yes; the sea-pay is greater.

Mr. THOMAS. The sea-pay of this grade is the same, as I have shown by the table to which I have referred. None of these pay directors or medical directors are now at sea. They have too much rank to go to sea. It may be asked why in the name of humanity I expect men to go to sea when they would be likely to swamp the Navy. I must say, since self-preservation is the first law of nature, and since the Congress of the United States has not seen fit to build any first-class vessels of war that can carry heavy guns, whether of iron, steel, or flesh, I can not blame these officers for not going to sea.

But the fact remains, we are keeping these men on the Naval Register, paying them year after year more than the governor of any State but two in this Union, when there is not one of them doing one particle of sea-service.

Then we have 5 medical inspectors at sea, 9 on shore-duty, and 1 on waiting orders.

We have 22 surgeons at sea, 20 on shore-duty, and 4 on waiting orders. There is no criticism to be made on the medical officers of the Navy, including and below the rank of surgeon, for these men may legitimately go to sea on board ship and perform duty; but the others can only go as the grand moguls of a squadron, as the chief medical officer of a fleet, who has not one particle of legitimate duty to perform. If he should go to sea he is simply a supernumerary and an expensive official ornament of the Navy.

There are 162 officers in the Medical Corps; 74 of them are at sea, and that number is made up of surgeons, passed assistant surgeons, and assistant surgeons. There are 74 of them at sea, 71 on shore-duty, and 16 on leave or waiting orders, and 1 under suspension.

We come next to the Pay Corps. The legitimate duty of a pay officer or a paymaster in the Navy is to go with his vessel and pay the officers and seamen. He is also commissary and quartermaster, it is true, but there should be no officer in the Pay Corps who has too much rank to go to sea. Yet we find of the 13 pay directors not one is at sea. Not one can go to sea. There are 8 on shore-duty and 5 on waiting orders.

Of pay inspectors there are 3 at sea, 8 on shore-duty, and 2 on waiting orders.

Then we come to the paymasters, who can perform legitimate duty. They have been kept within proper bounds of rank. There are 16 of them at sea, 22 on shore-duty, and 10 on waiting orders. Of passed assistant paymasters there are 15 at sea, 6 on shore-duty, 7 on leave or waiting orders, and 1 under suspension. Of assistant paymasters 7 are at sea, 6 on shore-duty, and 6 on leave or waiting orders.

There are 122 in this corps, 41 of whom are at sea, 50 on shore duty, 30 on leave or waiting orders, and one under suspension.

Of the chief engineers, with the rank of captain in the Navy or colonel in the Army, there are 24 at sea, 33 on shore duty, and 13 on leave or waiting orders. Of the passed assistant engineers, 44 are at sea, 32 on shore duty, 16 on leave or waiting orders, and one under suspension.

So on down through the list of the 240 officers of that corps, 112 are at sea, 92 on shore duty, 35 on leave or waiting orders, and one under suspension.

We come next to the Marine Corps. There are of colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors of the Marine Corps, not one of them at sea. There are 10 on shore duty, and 1 on leave or waiting orders. Of the captains, there are 7 at sea, 14 on shore duty, and 1 on leave or waiting orders. Of first lieutenants, 11 are at sea, 16 on shore duty, and 3 on leave or waiting orders. Of second lieutenants, there are 12 at sea and 8 on shore duty.

There are of the 83 officers in the Marine Corps 30 at sea, 48 on shore duty, and 5 on leave or waiting orders.

Of the commissioned officers of the Navy at sea January 15, 1884, on various stations, the following percentages were line officers: North Atlantic station, 60.5 per cent.; Pacific station, 60 per cent.; Asiatic station, 62.5 per cent.; European station, 60⅔ per cent.; South Atlantic station, 61 per cent.; training squadron, 68.7 per cent.; special service, 54.5 per cent.; or, of the total on sea-service, 61⅓ per cent.

By the act of August 5, 1882, there are allowed in the Navy only 1,121 commissioned officers, of which 620 are line and 501 staff officers, that is 55⅓ per cent. are line and 44⅔ per cent. are staff, but only 446 out of the 501 of the latter can go to sea.

By this it is shown that on January 15, 1884, of all the commissioned officers then at sea 61⅓ per cent. were line officers. Therefore, if any further reduction is made in the list of officers, it should be in the direction of doing away with these superfluous officers who have too much rank to go to sea, without regard to whether they belong to the line or staff.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether he is giving us this information for the purpose of showing we have too many officers or that we have too few ships?

Mr. THOMAS. I hope it will serve the double purpose of showing, first, that the present pay-table of the United States Navy is incongruous, unjust, and unequal, and, in the second place, that we have not ships now to give employment to the officers we are keeping in commission and under pay. This bill proposes to pay them, and I am showing some reasons, as I hope, why this bill should be amended when it comes up for amendment, and why this pay-table should be rectified and put on a just basis, and why these ranks and relative ranks of staff officers ought to be cut off, so these officers may be sent to sea in case they are needed and not kept as ornaments only.

Various attempts have been made to reduce the number of officers in the Navy which have resulted most unhappily in blocking promotions. There is nothing that adds so much to the efficiency either of the naval or the military service as the hope of that ultimate reward which comes from meritorious service in the shape of promotion; and, while I do not care to take that up now and discuss it thoroughly as it ought to be in this connection, I shall simply introduce with my remarks a table which will completely and exhaustively exhibit how thorough a block has occurred in the promotions in the naval service by reason of the slipshod legislation which, as a rule, has been tacked upon appropriation bills passed by Congress.

NOTES.—The above seventeen officers are the senior officers, respectively, of the classes with which they entered the service.
* Goodrich entered in 1861, but was advanced, with others; graduated in 1864; and really was treated as if entering in 1860.
† The grade of master is now junior lieutenant, and midshipman is junior ensign; but neither the pay, duty, nor relative positions are affected.
‡ Not yet promoted to ensign.

When the proper time comes I shall offer amendments to this bill which I hope may put some life, some spirit, and some hope of reward in the shape of promotion in the breasts of those officers who are now left without any.

Mr. GLASCOCK. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GLASCOCK. I notice in the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois that he has directed his criticisms, as I have been able to gather, almost exclusively against the staff officers of the Navy, because of the large proportion, as shown by the reports, of those who are on shore-duty as compared with the number of those who are in active service. Now, the question I wish to ask is, and I would like the gentleman to answer it, what is the proportion of commodores at sea in proportion to the number of those who are on shore-duty?

Mr. THOMAS. I am very glad the gentleman has asked me the question. It is one that I shall take pleasure in answering.

Mr. GLASCOCK. And whether out of the 22 commodores it is not true that 2 are at sea and the remainder are on shore-duty?

Mr. THOMAS. That I believe is true. I have no doubt that the gentleman's statement is correct. No; upon examination I find there are 3 at sea. But I say it is a fortunate question, because that is a strong reason, and one that was urged in the last Congress, why the grade of commodore should be abolished.

Mr. GLASCOCK. Then I would ask the gentleman further whether of the total number of captains now in the Navy it is not true that only 13 are at sea and 34 on shore-duty?

Mr. THOMAS. That may be true.

Mr. GLASCOCK. And whether of the commanders but twenty-three are at sea against sixty-four on shore-duty?

Mr. THOMAS. I think that is true. But as I was going on to say, I think that all appears by the Naval Register, and it furnishes only another and a stronger argument why we should go to work, and go to work at once, in earnest to build some ships, so that these officers can go to sea.

Mr. GLASCOCK. I agree with you there.

Mr. THOMAS. And, Mr. Chairman, if any gentleman will bring forward a proposition to put our nation on a respectable footing and a decent equality with the other nations of equal rank in the world; if a proposition is brought forward to build some ships for our Navy, whether they be first-rate, or second-rate, or third-rate ships—I do not care whether they be frigates or ironclads, monitors or gunboats, sloops or cruisers; I do no not care so that they are efficient and in keeping with the requirements of modern naval necessities—I will gladly vote for it, in order to put our Navy upon a proper footing.

Mr. GLASCOCK. If that be true, and the gentleman entertains such opinions, why is it that his remarks are directed solely against the staff officers of the Navy, and not against the line as well as the staff?

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman from California mistakes the force of my remarks, or rather I should say perhaps the force that I had intended to be given to my remarks. I make no such attack, as he seems to construe it, on the staff of the Navy. My object was to call attention to the present incongruous condition of the pay tables of the different grades of the Navy. This is an appropriation bill, and the pay-table of the Navy is undoubtedly a proper subject to consider in connection with it. It is proposed to appropriate money for the pay of these various grades; and I am showing simply, or attempting to show, that there is no justice in the present pay-table of the Navy; and since my remarks happen to reflect very severely upon the staff corps, I speak with no sort of prejudice in favor of others. I should have pursued exactly the same line of argument if the same cause of complaint had existed with reference to the line. I believe in the principle of eternal justice. I believe in placing men who perform similar duty upon an equal footing, and not in discriminating in favor of this or that or the other corps.

Every one who has looked into this question at all knows how completely and thoroughly helpless this nation is so far as ships of war are concerned, and I want to ask attention for a few moments to that branch of the subject. We have now in the American Navy thirty-one ships in commission. These are all that can do anything like service as naval vessels. The list is given in the Naval Register, as well as the kind of vessels, the number of guns they carry, their tonnage and displacement.

*Mallory propeller.

It will be found that we have but one first-rate (so called) war vessel, the Tennessee. She is a vessel of 4,840 tons displacement. She is wholly incapable of meeting any one of twenty vessels—any one of fifty vessels belonging to the British navy. She would be utterly helpless before any one of fifteen vessels belonging to the Spanish navy; any one of twenty vessels belonging to the Italian navy; she would be incapable of meeting any one of three vessels belonging to the Chilian navy, and to-day there is scarcely a civilized nation on earth but that could send some one or more of its war vessels here and lay the great cities both of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts under contribution.

Chili might with either one of her three great war vessels anchor outside the roads at San Francisco, and, across the narrow strip of land intervening, shell not only San Francisco but Oakland beyond, and might, by bringing those cities under her guns, demand a ransom sufficient to rebuild the American Navy. And yet how are we protected there? Not one ship in the whole South Atlantic squadron or along the Pacific coast that could stand fifteen minutes against any one of the three great Chilian war vessels. We have the Monadnock, a magnificent monitor now on the stocks at Mare Island navy-yard, in an incomplete condition. It seems to me that is short-sighted indeed for this Congress to leave that vessel in its unfinished condition or fail to make proper appropriations to complete it at once and furnish it with suitable ordnance for the defense of that city and that coast. And yet it is left out. There is nothing proposed. We go on in this slipshod way waiting for some national disaster to befall us before we wake up to the necessities of the hour. Any other nation, sir, would have along that coast for the protection of its cities, its people, and its commerce not less than a dozen vessels. We have the great ports of Portland, Oreg., and we have San Francisco, and a dozen or twenty other ports of importance along that coast, and yet not a vessel to defend them.

Of the thirty-nine vessels the largest one is the Tennessee. And then there is the Powhatan, an old wooden craft, that has been out of date for twenty-five years. There is the Trenton, the only decent vessel we have, a small vessel of 3,900 tons displacement, now en route to the Asiatic squadron as its flag-ship. There has been enough discussion in this House, in this as well as other Congresses, to familiarize every member of this House with the Trenton. There was a great deal said about her. She was the only ship built by ex-Secretary Robeson during his administration; and whatever complaint might have been made against him or his administration this may be said to his credit, that he built the only decent vessel the American Navy has afloat to-day.

Then we have the Lancaster, an old wooden tub that was, under the name of repairs, substantially rebuilt; rebuilt at an expense of $1,657,210.66. A vessel that would not be classed by any naval power of the world as a fifth-rate is now the flag-ship of the Mediterranean squadron. She is wholly useless as a vessel of war. I question whether the best time she could make under circumstances the most favorable would be as much as ten knots an hour. She is simply an old wooden obsolete.

Then we have the Brooklyn, the Pensacola, the Hartford, the Richmond, the Omaha, the Lackawanna, the Vandalia, and the Monongahela. Run through that list and you will find they are all monuments of the shame and disgrace of this country; glorious vessels in their day and wonderful service did they perform in their age of usefulness, but they belong to a past era and are unworthy of this day and of this Government.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] the other day in somewhat ironical terms wanted to know why the last Congress, the Republicans having control, had not rebuilt our Navy. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the last Congress did take the first steps toward reorganizing and rebuilding the Navy; it authorized the building of the only four modern ships of war that have been authorized since the war. And I am very glad to be able to say that it was treated as a wholly non-partisan question, and that men on both sides of the House with American hearts in them came forward, feeling the necessities of our country, and voted for the appropriation for building the Chicago, the Boston, the Atlanta, and the Dolphin, vessels which are to be completed about the 1st of next December. With these four vessels we are making a start toward the establishment of a modern navy. But when completed, if the provisions in this bill are carried out or if this bill in it present form should be allowed to become a law, of what use will they be to us? There is not a modern gun to put aboard them. Ah, yes, there is one. There has been one high-power breech-loading six-inch rifle gun built, and that is the only modern cannon we have for these four great war vessels. There is no appropriation in this bill to go on and furnish the necessary ordnance for these ships. So what is the use to build the ships, to make an appropriation for their completion, unless we take steps to arm them? These great guns every one knows can not be built in one month, in six months, or a year. The very best that can be done is to build one of these guns in two years. And it seems to me that we should make appropriations in this bill to furnish sufficient ordnance for these ships, and we should not hesitate to make it now.

There are various provisions of the bill which I had thought to discuss in general debate, but feeling that a better understanding of them could be had by calling attention to them as they come up for amendment, I think I shall only advert to one or two of its provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. THOMAS. I am informed that my time has expired.

Mr. FINERTY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois ten minutes more.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman from Illinois has stated the condition of the Navy as being very deplorable indeed. Now I want to ask him whose fault that is? Is it the fault of Congress or the fault of the Executive that our Navy is in the condition that it now is?

Mr. THOMAS. I should say unhesitatingly that it was the fault of Congress that our Navy is in its present condition, for the reason that the Executive of the nation has no power to build ships or to expend money for any purpose connected with the Navy unless he be so authorized by the Congress of the United States. It is not enough to say that Congress was distrustful of the Navy Department or disliked the administration of the Navy Department. That will not justify Congress for its failure in this regard. It was at any time in the power of Congress to do as the last Congress did, make provision for these vessels to be built under the supervision of an advisory board, requiring a complete report to be made to Congress, so that there should be no opportunity for any dishonest or extravagant work. There is no excuse for Congress not having made that provision if deemed necessary.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Permit me to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. My friend was in the Naval Committee room when Admiral Porter came before the committee a few days ago.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Did not Admiral Porter state before that committee that Congress had been good to the Navy, but that the appropriations made for this purpose had been wasted? I ask the gentleman if he did not hear Admiral Porter say so?

Mr. THOMAS. As I now recall the statement of the Admiral, I think he was referring to the building of some vessel, the Alarm probably, when he remarked that Congress had been very good. The Admiral was in a most complacent mood that day, and was desirous of having the committee feel in the same way, for at that moment he was urging the building of a gunboat which was to be constructed under his supervision. He is too much of a diplomat to go into the committee-room and assail the committee or the members of this House by saying that they had been churlish or had not done their duty. He understands human nature as well as does my friend from Georgia [Mr. BUCHANAN], who always slips up, in an honorable and legitimate way, on the soft side of a proposition which he desires to carry.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But you do not answer my question. Did not he say that the appropriations for the Navy had been wasted?

Mr. THOMAS. He said that he had no doubt that there had been money misapplied or unnecessarily expended. And to explain that, he said that when a vessel is built in a navy-yard every solitary bolt which is made takes two or three men to examine it, to be present when it is driven into the vessel in order to see that everything is exactly right. And so in that way a great deal of money had been unnecessarily expended.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Did he not say that the appropriations had been wasted?

Mr. THOMAS. I am not quite certain whether he employed that exact term or not. But that is what I gathered from what he said. And that is another reason why I think that all naval vessels ought to be built by contract under proper limitations.

I do not think it is any more the business of the Congress of the United States to maintain a navy-yard for the building of vessels than it is to maintain a cotton factory for the manufacture of calico or muslin. I think that should be left to the people who are versed in such matters, to skilled artisans, to enterprising business men who are competent to construct our ships of war. We ought to patronize them by having them build such vessels as we need. The only cause of complaint, and it is a just cause, made against the Navy Department by the people of this country has been in reference to the manner in which our navy-yards have been conducted. I do not pretend to justify them. I believe it costs three dollars to do a piece of work in a Government navy-yard to every one dollar which it would cost to have the same work done by contract.

I am greatly obliged to my colleague [Mr. FINERTY] for the time he has yielded to me.

Mr. FINERTY. I rise, Mr. Chairman, with some degree of diffidence to address the House on a subject of such importance as the increase of the American Navy. I do so with all the more diffidence because an important committee of this House, which holds the purse-strings of the nation, appears determined to be economical in regard to the weakest point of our national structure. In this connection I desire to say that I distinguish between political economy and political parsimony.

The statistics which have already been laid before the Committee of the Whole by the gentlemen who have preceded me on this question have been so amplified that I do not feel called upon to enter into minute details of that description. But the outer world, as well as the United States, is aware that the condition of our defensive marine at the present time is a menace to the well-being of this country if in the event of war we should be found as we now are unprepared to meet any enemy of respectable strength. It is to this point of the question under discussion that I desire particularly to address myself.

At the beginning of this session I brought into this House a bill in consonance with the message of the Executive, which contained a recommendation that in my mind did not fully come up to the requirements of the case, but which at least was a step in advance. I am fully aware of the impossibility of at once creating a great defensive and offensive navy. But there is nothing to hinder the construction of ships that will enable us in the event of sudden hostilities to retaliate on the commerce of our opponents and compel their immense fleets to act as convoys to their merchant marine. It is for this reason that I favor the increase in the number of steel cruisers, some of which were voted by a former Congress, and money for the completion of which is now recommended by the Committee on Appropriations of this House.

We are pointed over and over again to the vast and majestic fleets of England, of France, of Germany, and the other great powers of Europe. Gentlemen have grown eloquent in picturing even the potency of little Chili as compared with this mighty nation, whose resources are ample to cover the ocean with the largest fleet that ever sailed beneath the skies. It makes little difference to us now who is responsible for the present depleted condition of the United States navy. The fact remains that virtually we have no navy. The business of this Congress is to supply the deficiency. Party criminations and recriminations will not give us a navy to protect our honor, our commerce, or our dignity. Whatever errors have been committed in the past, it is our duty to rectify those errors by at least giving us something wherewith to assert the potency of a nation that in numerical strength and natural resources is second to none other on the earth.

Those very resources, imperfectly defended, would tempt the cupidity of powerful enemies. Our military strength might, indeed, repel the invader, but America should not be left exposed to the chance of an invading army profaning her soil for a single day.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I stand here to-day to advocate in the fullest sense the building of these additional cruisers. The question of the staff, the question of the division of the bureaus, all of these are but secondary. The primary and pivotal question, the one to which the American nation must address itself, is, shall we or shall we not begin to build a navy worthy of the American name?

You may say, and the opponents of the increase of the navy say, "Cruisers are no protection;" but we can not wait for years to construct great ships like those with which England now dominates the ocean. In the event, as I have said, of sudden hostilities, we have only this one resource besides the torpedo defense and the shore-battery defense, the latter of which is in a state as lamentable and deficient as our decayed and shamefully impotent navy. The cruisers, it is true, are not ships of defense, but, lightly equipped as they will be and carrying improved guns, they can be turned loose on the commerce of an enemy and compel his gigantic fleets to convoy his merchant marine, thereby drawing off from our seaports the strength of his blockade. I think it a wise provision to have these additional cruisers, and I shall do all in my power, as a member of this House, to provide for their immediate construction.

Economy I am in favor of in all things bearing on our national business; but I hold it is no economy to wait on Providence to send us a fleet or a strong alliance when the hour of necessity arises. It is no economy to leave ourselves, as the American press has stated again and again, and as our naval journals have stated and as the naval journals of France and England and Russia have stated—to leave ourselves so powerless that the smallest nation in the world can to-day insult us with impunity as to immediate consequences. Is this a position commensurate with the vastness of our territory, the extent of our seaboard, and the pre-eminent glory of the American arms when compelled into conflict?

I know that the American nation, when the crisis is upon it, will rise equal to the occasion. It has always done so, and I will say this, that it is only truly great when in the presence of a real danger. I am not a professional alarmist, who wishes to say that we are on the eve of war. I hope we are not. I do not desire war. I want to see this country peaceful and prosperous; but peaceful and prosperous she can only remain when she has the means to avenge an insult, the means to defend her honor and assert the supremacy of her national flag. On the ocean, at least, she has not now the means to do all this. She is an unarmored giant, and in her almost helpless condition, can be made the prey of pigmies weaponed and prepared.

If I were standing here to advocate the raising of a large army for maintenance by the nation you could assail me on the ground that a huge standing army is dangerous to the liberties of the country. I agree with that sentiment. But the Navy is dangerous to no one except the enemy. The Navy is the guardian of the national heart, planted on the frontiers of the ocean. And with the record that our Navy has, the record beginning with Paul Jones and John Barry and coming down to Farragut and to Porter, the record which not even Nelson in his mightiest days has eclipsed, the record of the valor of the American sailor, proved in a thousand battles—with this record, I say, and with this great nation behind the Government to maintain and advance its power, it is a shame to leave us to day—I will not say the laughing-stock, but I will say the pitiful astonishment of armed nations. We have no guarantee of eternal peace. What can alone give us that guarantee? A state of preparation proportioned to the interests we may at any time be called upon to defend.

We have been fortunate in keeping out of war. I hope we shall continue so. But the history of our country shows that nearly all our wars have been sudden and in a great measure unprovided for. Leaving out the war of the Revolution, we will take that of 1812. Had England then been free to hurl against us her great fleets it is hard to say how that war would have ended; but tied up by her wars with France, England was unable to assail us with her full naval and military strength. We won much glory in that war both on sea and on land; but suppose we were called upon to-morrow to wage such another, can any gentleman present in this House say that the national defenses are sufficient bulwarks against the foe?

Then, again, when we came to the war with Mexico, if Mexico had had a navy we might have found it a more serious task to capture the harbor and defenses of Vera Cruz. We narrowly escaped war with England again on the northwestern boundary question, and the memory of the Virginius affair with Spain is fresh in the mind of the country.

When the rebellion broke out we found ourselves almost without a navy. When gentlemen point to that as a precedent, stating that America will be sufficient for the occasion when it arises, I remind them that we were then fighting against a section of our own people and built within our own confines the fleet that enabled us to put down the rebellion, but which would be now of no avail against a potent enemy like any of the European powers.

Consequently it will be necessary for us now to make a beginning. We want to see the good work begun by the Forty-seventh Congress followed up by the Forty-eighth, the gradual establishment of a navy. I am with the Committee on Appropriations on the general principle of economy; but it is better for us to expend the few millions asked for in the construction of these additional cruisers than to leave ourselves open to the chance of devastation on our Atlantic and Pacific seaboards.

I am sure gentlemen from New York would not feel very comfortable, especially after the experience of Alexandria and the testimony of the foreign officers who witnessed that memorable bombardment, if they knew that in the event of difficulty with a foreign power it is possible for France, Germany, or Great Britain within a fortnight at most to put a sufficient force of ironclads in front of that city to burn it to the ground. We have the testimony of the engineers who witnessed the bombardment to which I have alluded that the English shot carried fully seven miles and that buildings were burned nine miles from the naval line of fire in the city of Alexandria or its suburbs.

These things we may laugh at in the distance. We may say we can not come into conflict with any power. We may say we have no jealousies or rivalries in Europe. Although that may be true of us, Mr. Chairman, it is not perhaps as true of Europe itself. We may respect the Monroe doctrine, we may live up to its sentiment, but we can not at present hinder the powers of Europe from interfering with us whenever they feel so inclined. And low down here between the two continents, striking the Isthmus of Panama, we can hear the click of the European spade as it digs that canal to bind the Atlantic and the Pacific together. And I tell you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this House, that what Europe digs with the spade she will maintain with the sword. The sooner we look at this question in that light the better for us. The sooner we see to it that we are not left to the mercy of events and the chance of a strong alliance, the better it will be for this nation.

I do not, as I have said, anticipate immediate difficulty; but gifted as we are with great resources, with widely extended commercial relations, growing more and more powerful, building up more and more our wealth, the necessity of safeguard and protection for that power and wealth is demonstrated the more fully.

The poor man may leave his door unlocked, for he has nothing to be robbed of. The rich man must double lock and bar his premises against the robbers. And what is true of individuals in such condition is also true of nations.

I do not, Mr. Chairman, in these remarks address myself to the minor questions, having spoken on the general subject nearest to my heart, which is the increase of the fleet. But I wish to say a word in reference to the staff of the Navy, and while there may be perhaps need for a certain amount of reduction, I hardly think a sweeping measure would be conducive to the best interests of the service. The staff officer in time of war is certainly as needful as the line officer, and if when peace comes upon us and the men who have served us faithfully are relegated to private life, or put upon the retired-list, it certainly is a very bad method of promoting esprit du corps.

In regard to the separation of the Bureaus of Construction and Steam-Engineering, we tried the non-consolidated method in the worst crisis through which the nation has passed. We tried it through the civil war and we found it excellent in operation. We found that by having the two bureaus we got along faster than with a single one.

There may perhaps be good reasons given for the consolidation; but I must confess that the reasons advanced by my eloquent colleague from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] did not strike me as being particularly conclusive on that question.

I have spoken with officers of the Navy in reference to this matter, and they assured me there is no difficulty whatever in the fitting up of the boilers and steam apparatus of a vessel, apart from the hull and other elements of construction, if only proper care is taken at first. But, in any case, whether the staff is cut down or maintained, whether you separate the bureaus or not, whatever you may do in minor details, there is one thing I would urge on the House, and that is not to neglect the recommendations which have been made, feeble though they are. Do not lessen the defense that is proposed and declared necessary by the Executive of the country. [Applause.]

I speak in no partisan sense. I speak here from the standpoint simply of an American, and in the few words with which I am about to conclude I ask you to bear in mind that this is the time to prepare for danger, not when the danger is upon you; and I hope the vote of this House will sustain whatever may be reasonably proposed in the way of increasing our facilities to retaliate upon any enemy who may be impelled to attack us. [Great applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. FINERTY. No. I reserve my time, and will now yield fifteen minutes of what remains to my friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, twenty-five years ago, when I was a good, loyal Democrat in the State of Pennsylvania, I listened with profound interest to a speech delivered by the father of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL]. It was an eloquent speech, one fringed with the brilliancy of genius, and for that reason I have never forgotten it. The chief point was that under the policy of the Democratic party the sails of American commerce whitened every sea. Now at that time, in 1858, the shipping of this country amounted to over 5,000,000 tons per annum, and well could the Democratic party stand up in the face of the nation and point to its record with reference to her great commercial interests.

Our tonnage this year amounts to almost the same sum, but then, Mr. Chairman, it was carried in American ships, under the American flag, and was conducted by American sailors. But during these eventful twenty-five years our Democratic friends, by reason of the late unpleasantness, have swept this vast commerce from the ocean and handed it over to Europe.

This is a most singular bill, Mr. Chairman. The estimates made by the Navy Department amount to $22,000,000 and upward. The Committee on Appropriations have reduced the amount of these estimates over $8,000,000, and in the very face of the fact that we have no navy to-day by which we could resent insult offered us by any foreign country, no matter how feeble and insignificant. This is the economy that is to be practiced on this country during this year, when we have a surplus revenue of $150,000,000 in the Treasury, to be made up next year in a deficiency bill; because that has been the constant history of the Democratic party, that whenever they had the control of this House, cheese-paring, peanut business was indulged in during the year that preceded a Presidential election, and they go to the country on that issue and that claim, but only to be followed by innumerable deficiency bills as soon as the Presidential election is over. Every man who has been here for the last eight or ten years knows that I am stating only God Almighty's truth when I say that.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BELFORD. No; not now. I will let you in after a while.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Just a question in this connection.

Mr. BELFORD. Well, go on.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Did I understand the gentleman from Colorado to say that there was a surplus in the Treasury now?

Mr. BELFORD. Always a surplus [laughter], swelling, rich, and blooming, like an English plum-pudding [renewed laughter], guarded by the attendant genii of Pennsylvania and New York. The same men who are running this bill on the cheese-paring principle are its guardians, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and my friend [Mr. RANDALL], and the gentleman to whom he intrusts the bill to manage it and get it through this House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS]. They have joined their shields together to play before the country the rôle of dramatic economists. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, let me call the attention of this committee to a few facts that are worthy of their serious consideration. Take France: each year she appropriates $32,000,000 for the support of her navy. Take England: she appropriates each year over $51,000,000 for the support and maintenance of her navy. Well, Mr. Chairman, could she anchor her ships three miles from Alexandria and blow those forts to pieces. And yet the great commercial interests of this nation are to be sacrificed in order that the Democratic party, under a fraudulent pretext, shall go before the country next summer and declare themselves to be the champion economists of this nation! I say, sir, that the best economy is that which guards our interests to-day; because in guarding them to-day we guard them for the future—we guard them for all time.

God bless the memory of Andrew Jackson! He was a good Democrat; but he said that in time of peace we should prepare for war, and I say so now. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] You needn't laugh; I do not make any historical mistakes, I think. I hope that the Democratic party will rise to the spirit of liberality and generosity and courage, to the magnificent and all-swelling patriotism of such a man as Andrew Jackson, and give us a navy that will at least protect the city of New York in the East and the city of Galveston in the West, and not go before the country with the parade of economy on the one hand, while you are keeping out of the hands of the honest industries of this nation the millions that are to-day encompassed within and encumbering the national Treasury.

Now I have had my say. [Applause.]

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, it has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY] that the Forty-seventh Congress initiated reforms in regard to the Navy, and that there was a good deal of legislation accomplished by that Congress in the direction of the building of a new Navy; and he expressed the hope that this House would pursue the same line of policy, and that there would be no hesitation on the part of the Committee on Appropriations. I had hoped, sir, that when the naval appropriation bill was presented to the House it would be in the line of the reforms and of the policy which were commenced by the last House of Representatives. And I am surprised that the Committee on Appropriations has prepared for consideration the bill now pending in the Committee of the Whole.

You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that we promised the country in the last Congress that if the permanent reformatory legislation upon our naval appropriation bills was not repealed, and was faithfully executed, in a few years a sufficient sum would be saved to the national Treasury to build a new improved navy. We went so far as to prove it by the statements and tables which we submitted. We trusted—I may safely say the country expected—this Congress would continue the work and devote the savings under our legislation to the building and armament of ships. We provided the way by which the money could be saved from the amounts of appropriations made in previous years.

Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the committee to what we did do under the leadership of the present Secretary of the Navy.

First, Mr. Chairman, we reduced an overgrown naval list from 1,817 active officers to 1,572. We made a staff reduction of 140, a line reduction of 115.

As was stated by the Secretary of the Navy in his report:

> The enormous disproportion of 1,817 naval officers to thirty-one vessels in commission, being 59 officers to each ship and one officer to every five seamen, with the possibility of the addition each year to the Navy of 50 cadet-midshipmen from one-sixth the Congressional districts in the country, and of 25 cadet-engineers, induced Congress at the last session to prohibit the increase of the naval officers, and to direct a slight gradual reduction. The act of August 5, 1882, provided that thereafter no appointments in the Navy from graduates of the Naval Academy should be made except to fill vacancies; that no promotions should be made in the principal staff corps until the Medical Corps should be reduced 10, the Pay Corps 30, the Engineer Corps 100, and that only one-half the vacancies in the line above the grade of midshipman should be filled by promotion until there should be a reduction of 4 rear-admirals, 15 commodores, 5 captains, 5 commanders, 6 lieutenant-commanders, 30 lieutenants, 25 masters, and 25 ensigns.

The full effect of our legislation has been only half accomplished by the process of leaving half the vacancies unfilled, but the requirements for the pay of the Navy for the next fiscal year will be $6,932,605, against $7,133,980 for the current year, a saving by the last Congress of $201,275. And this saving will be increased from year to year in the annual appropriation necessary to be made for the pay of the Navy until it will reach $500,000 each year.

We also stopped the appointments from the Naval Academy except to fill vacancies. The rapid increase of officers without ships made this necessary. Within three years prior to August 5, 1882, the line had increased one hundred and sixty-eight and the staff sixty, making an increase of two hundred and twenty-eight men.

The following table shows the variation in the number of officers of the Navy from July, 1877, to July, 1882:

	July, 1877.	January, 1878.	January, 1879.	January, 1880.	January, 1881.	January, 1882.	July, 1882.	Increase or decrease.	Net increase.

The above table shows an increase in the number of line officers and engineer officers during the five years preceding the act of August 5 as follows:

Total increase of line officers, one hundred and sixty-eight; of engineer officers, sixty-three; total, two hundred and thirty-one. Increase per annum of line officers, thirty-three; of engineer officers, twelve; total increase per annum, forty-five.

This increase was due to the admission from the academy into both corps of a supply of graduates in excess of the waste of the service after the large number of vacancies left in the junior grades at the close of the war had been filled.

In the line, the lowest grade having a fixed limit was that of ensign, the number allowed by law being one hundred. Below the ensigns was the quasi-grade of midshipmen, the number of which was not limited, and which therefore became a reservoir for surplus graduates. It was foreseen that the grade of ensign would shortly fill up, and by way of preventing accumulation on the midshipmen's list a device was adopted in the act of March 3, 1873, by which the academy course was changed from four to six years. This reduced the number of annual appointments to the academy from one-fourth to one-sixth of the whole number, thus slightly lowering the annual supply; but as this reduction was too slight to prevent a surplus, and as no provision was made for promotion by an increase of the higher grades, the accumulation continued, the young men who had passed the four years' course merely remaining cadet-midshipmen for two years longer, instead of immediately becoming midshipmen. In 1880 the list of ensigns was filled up to the legal number, and since then the rolling up of surplus midshipmen and cadet-midshipmen progressed steadily until the act of August 5, 1882, put a stop to it, and made the number of graduates conform to the actual waste of the list of officers.

In the Engineer Corps the same process was going on, although the accumulation has not reached such a high figure. The number of cadets graduating from the academy was twenty-four a year, while the waste of the corps was less than ten a year. The legal limit in the number of assistant engineers, one hundred, had not yet been reached, as there were only sixty-two of that grade on the list in July, 1882, but there were sixty-two cadet-engineers to fill the thirty-eight vacancies, leaving a clear surplus of twenty-four cadet-engineers, which, but for the act of August 5, would have been increased at the rate of twenty-four a year, while the waste of the service would have annually diminished it by less than half that number.

The saving by this legislation alone, if applied annually to the building of new ships, in a few years would go far toward giving us a navy with which the country would be satisfied and of which the nation might be proud.

The last Congress passed a law designed to reduce the employment of naval officers on shore-duty instead of sending them to sea. It provided for clearing the Navy of worthless old hulks, obsolete old material, under a judicious and limited law. It grappled with the crying evils arising from the expensive navy-yards.

I believe that we had some seven yards in full operation. Further on in my remarks I shall point out the immense sum of money that has been expended upon those yards, without to any appreciable extent benefiting the country. We grappled, I say, with this great evil and reduced the navy-yards to three. And the gross appropriations for yards and docks were thereby reduced, as I shall point out.

For the fiscal years 1874–'75 the appropriation was $2,305,655; for the fiscal years 1875–'76 it was nearly $2,000,000. It is true that for 1878–'79 it was reduced to $932,000, and for the years 1879–'80 the appropriation was only $953,000. But for 1880–'81 it was increased to $1,294,715; for 1881–'82 it was $1,162,000; but for 1882–'83 it was only $1,067,000. For the fiscal years 1883–'84 we reduced the appropriation for this purpose to $893,813.

Recapitulation of all appropriations for Bureau of Yards and Docks.

1874–'75	$2,305,655 00
1875–'76	1,989,321 00
1876–'77	1,059,024 47
1877–'78	702,624 49
1878–'79	932,913 42
1879–'80	953,715 25
1880–'81	1,294,715 25
1881–'82	1,162,719 25
1882–'83	1,067,566 12
1883–'84	893,813 00
	12,369,067 25

Here, again, is a saving by the wise policy adopted by the last House that will do much toward giving to the country a new and modern navy.

It reduced the appropriations for repairs and preservation. They had been as high, I believe, for the fiscal years 1874–'75 as $500,000. For 1879–'80 the appropriation was reduced to $300,000, and that figure was maintained for the fiscal years 1880–'81 and 1881–'82. For the fiscal years 1882–'83 we reduced that appropriation, by the policy of closing up the navy-yards, to $200,000, and for 1883–'84 it was reduced to $150,000.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to the maintenance appropriation, because it was involved in this same scheme. For the fiscal years 1876–'77 that appropriation was $440,000; and that figure was maintained down to 1882. Then by the policy which we had adopted we were enabled to reduce the appropriation for 1882–'83 to $220,000, and we appropriated a like sum of money for the present fiscal year.

The civil establishment was likewise involved. For the fiscal years 1874–'75 it was given $157,000. For the fiscal years 1876–'77 the appropriation was reduced to $85,000; for 1877–'78 it was increased to $150,000; for 1878–'79 it was increased to $189,000; and for 1880–'81 the appropriation was $191,000. In 1882 we could reduce it to $104,000, and in 1883 to $97,000.

These reductions and this saving of money were due entirely to the legislation proposed and urged by the present Secretary of the Navy, and enacted by the last Congress into law, in reference to the navy-yards of the country. To accomplish this we provided for a navy-yard commission and for the stopping of work in all the yards where it could not be done profitably and the concentration of work in the others. The result has been that only two navy-yards are now maintained on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific.

The shrieks of locality did not deter us. For eight years the Democracy controlled the House, and was too weak to accomplish this great work or even to attempt it or too ignorant to conceive it. Annually we heard their professions of economy, which consisted in maintaining useless navy-yards and the repair of more useless ships, but the policy of closing these expensive establishments and thereby saving money enough to build new improved ships was beyond the courage, the capacity, or even the consideration of the Democratic leaders here. We stopped the extravagant repairs of old wooden ships. To the appropriation for construction and repairs we added this provision:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ships when the estimated cost of such repairs shall exceed 30 per cent. of the estimated cost of a new ship of the same size and like material.

A similar clause was added to the appropriation for the Bureau of Steam-Engineering.

The clause in the act of March 3, 1883, was as follows:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs, to be appraised by a competent board of naval officers, shall exceed 20 per cent. of the estimated cost, appraised in like manner, of a new ship of the same size and like material.

A similar clause was added to the appropriation for the Bureau of Steam-Engineering.

The Secretary of the Navy, in his report of November 29, 1882, referring to the 30 per cent. limitation in the act of August 5, said:

This wise provision should be adhered to in future appropriations, and the limitation of repairs fixed at 20 per cent. or less.

In pursuance of this recommendation the act of March 3, 1883, reduced the percentage to 20, as above stated.

These limitations upon the authority to repair and keep in existence old wooden vessels were justified by the enormous expenditures which had been made in such repairs.

See statement showing the original cost and the expenses for the repairs of all vessels now on the Navy Register, transmitted by the Secretary January 11, 1884 (Senate Executive Document No. 48). Note in particular the Ossipee, lately repaired at the Philadelphia navy-yard. She cost in 1861 $407,064.20, and the repairs to her since have amounted to $2,194,730.27, including $426,748.92 expended on her to prepare her for her present cruise. This statement does not embrace the cost in the department of equipment and recruiting, which will probably be from $25,000 to $30,000.

The Shenandoah cost in 1862 $463,866.75, and the repairs since have amounted to $1,679,664.92, including $172,832.17 expended on her to prepare her for her present cruise.

I have pointed out briefly the economic measures which were adopted by the last Congress and which will result in saving money to build and give to this nation as good a navy as any other power on the face of the earth has. We commenced the work practically from the savings insured by our legislation. We propose to continue it without increasing the annual expenditures for the naval service authorized by our economical Democratic predecessors. The Chicago was authorized, and the Boston, the Atlanta, and the Dolphin, and I believe they have the forced approval as to model and material of the Committee on Appropriations, and when completed will go far toward answering the necessities of the nation.

But our Committee on Appropriations now propose to change this policy. In the matter of repairing the old wooden ships they have gone backward, and provide that repairs may be made on old wooden ships when the estimated cost thereof does not exceed 30 per cent. of the cost of a new ship of like size and material, thus increasing the number of wooden ships upon which repairs can be made, and continuing the policy of a navy of wooden ships, so valueless in these times and so expensive to maintain and keep in repair, as I have just shown you, costing us enough in a few years for repairs alone to build a new navy of the character and quality and of the material of the ships the last Congress authorized.

I shall be delighted if some member of the Committee on Appropriations, the chairman of that committee or my distinguished colleague who prepared and has charge of the bill, will inform us why this change is made. It is not good policy for Congress to be constantly changing its policy in regard to the old wooden ships for insufficient cause, and therefore I ask for the cause. Let it be pointed out.

When this reduction from 30 to 20 per cent. was before the last House it was not, as I now recollect, even criticised; a protest was not entered against it. Why, then, should we make a change? Do we wish to continue the support and maintenance of the old wooden vessels, or is it the fact that this policy has been adopted by the present Committee on Appropriations with the intention of stopping the building of new ships?

The policy which the last House (Republican) gave the country will build a navy in a few years without increasing the naval appropriations above those of the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses, when we had a Democratic majority in the House. We adopted your bills of those Congresses as our guides as to the amount which should be expended after you had reduced the naval appropriations to the lowest possible point to which you dared go, doing nothing in the way of new ships. We said we will not exceed your appropriations, in the long run will decrease the amounts, and yet will give the country a new navy of first-class ships, and we gave you a policy that I have proved to you will produce that result.

We pointed out the way in which money could be saved. We gave the country legislation which will save to the Treasury vast sums, and you propose to take the advantage of this legislation, and, by stopping the work we commenced, reduce the appropriations below the point you believed possible when you had control, lacking the statesmanship and wisdom to comprehend the reforms I have referred to. Yes, your bill carries less money for the next fiscal year than we appropriated for the current year. We put it in your power to make such a bill if you dared to stop the work we commenced, but it shall be advertised to the country if you do stop it and just how you have made the saving. You shall not have the honor of adding to the Navy if you do not add to it, and if you postpone its creation—creation is the proper word, for we have none now—you shall have full credit for that. If you want to go on with the work we commenced, attach to this bill the Senate bill which has just reached here providing for new ships. The construction of the ships by the last Congress was provided for upon the naval appropriation bills, and I do not now recall the fact that gentlemen on the other side raised any point of order against those provisions being considered upon a general appropriation bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If we are to build ships, on what plan shall we build them; the present plan?

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I can not discuss with the gentleman from Kentucky the plans. I only know for one that we should have a navy to compare with that of any other nation upon the face of the earth. When the question is presented as to the plan upon which the ships should be built, I must refer it to experts upon that subject.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a further question? In the appropriation bill of last year did we not insert an item providing for trying the deflective armor of N. B. Clark, which was expected to revolutionize the whole Navy? And will the gentleman tell me whether the present Secretary of the Navy or his board has yet tried a single experiment with the $20,000 appropriated for that purpose?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know; and I must repeat the reply I have already made to the gentleman, that the question as to how these ships shall be built, their plans and materials in specific detail, must be left to those in authority, unless a bill is brought in which regulates all this. If that is done, we will discuss it, I suppose, in the best light we have.

Mr. Chairman, I have dwelt perhaps at unnecessary length on this question of the old ships. But, sir, if you look a little further at this bill you will discover that while the committee have increased the number of old ships upon which money shall be expended in the way of repairs, they have proposed so scanty an appropriation for the supply and maintenance of those vessels in the service that it will be impossible for them to be sent out of our ports. I repeat, I hope at some time during this discussion we shall be told by gentlemen on the other side who have charge of this bill why this change of policy is proposed.

I now call attention to the fact that not only is the number of old ships that are to be repaired increased, but the committee refuse to make the proper appropriation for the armament of new ships. I believe that when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] was upon the floor he called the attention of the committee to this, and he was told by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations there had been apportioned from the appropriation which was made by the Forty-seventh Congress a sum of money for this purpose. And we have here the letter of the Secretary stating that this money will all be exhausted in the current year, and that it is absolutely necessary that there should be an additional appropriation of some $400,000 for the armament of new ships, and that the time of their being put in commission will be delayed until such appropriation is made.

Gentlemen, we gave you the law; we gave you permanent legislation by which you have been enabled to reduce the ordinary amounts for running the naval service of the United States. For the reduction of the officers of the Navy, and thus the pay of the Navy, and for the closing of navy-yards, we adopted permanent legislation saving vast sums to the Treasury. And you are enabled to make this bill a million of dollars less than was appropriated for the current year, but you will in the end expend more than this sum upon the old ships. Continue them in use, and nothing will be saved, but money will be lost to the Treasury. All that you will be able to point to as your achievement will be the reduction of the annual appropriation bill a million of dollars for the next fiscal year, but involving largely increased expenditures if the policy is continued in subsequent years.

I appeal to the gentleman who has charge of this bill, my colleague [Mr. HUTCHINS], a gentleman whom I greatly respect, and who upon his committee represents the great commercial city of New York, whether this is in line with the sentiment of that great city? And I ask him if this increase in the number of old wooden ships that are to be repaired and the failure to provide for the armament of the new ships means a change of policy; that a halt has been called upon the policy of building a new navy, even when money can be saved by it? And is this in the line of the commercial interest of the whole country? And will he go on with it for the purpose of pointing to the fact that a Democratic House of Representatives had been able to reduce an annual appropriation bill a million of dollars for one year, but at great loss to the Government in subsequent years? I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, it will be well to do this. But I pass from this point for a moment. If this bill becomes a law, I believe when we meet here next session deficiencies sufficient to overcome all there is of reduction below the appropriations for the current year will be brought in.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say that deficiencies are created by maladministration. And there is already a deficiency of nearly $1,000,000 under the bill of last year.

Mr. HISCOCK. I thank the gentleman for his interruption. I have heard him make that statement before.

Mr. RANDALL. You are mistaken. I did not have the knowledge until within a day or two to make it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I mean the statement that deficiencies are due to maladministration. I concede, sir, that maladministration may create deficiencies, and if maladministration shall present to this Congress a single deficiency I will gladly join with him in helping to defeat any appropriation bill to cover that deficiency. Ay, more than that, I will vote to expose that maladministration.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us understand each other. Perhaps we are occupying the same ground. Do I understand the gentleman to assert there is authority on the part of any Department to involve the Government in expenditure beyond the amount appropriated? I speak of practical administration.

Mr. HISCOCK. So will I. I say that a large portion of the appropriations made by Congress are under permanent laws. They are for the payment of money under permanent legislation over which Congress has no control except by repealing the laws. Heretofore I have had occasion to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to that fact. Take, for instance, the appropriation for the pay of the Navy, take the appropriation for the pay of the Army; what control have we, or rather what control has the Department, over that question? The law fixes the amount of pay to every man in every grade of the service. If you appropriate only one-half of the amount required by law of the necessary sum to pay the Navy, the result is that the Navy is only half paid, and they will come in here next session for the balance. Nothing really is saved.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say to the gentleman from New York that the amount appropriated in this bill for the pay of the Navy is exactly what is called for by the estimates.

Mr. HISCOCK. I concede that; and I have used it only to illustrate my position.

Mr. RANDALL. The illustration was unfortunate.

Mr. HISCOCK. Not at all. If sufficient appropriation be not made we will at the next session be presented with this condition of things: The Department will come here and say we have maintained the naval establishment of the Government up to the present time. You see how it has been done. Can you tell where we could have curtailed it? The money has been expended, and the deficiency will have to be supplied or your ships must be brought home and your works stopped, your yards closed, the whole establishment closed, for that matter.

Let me illustrate my position further. I do not wish to have any misunderstanding with the gentleman from Pennsylvania or the Committee on Appropriations. I will take the Post-Office appropriation bill. You may cut down the appropriations for the Post-Office Department, and I have no doubt you will. You may give an inadequate sum of money to maintain that Department. Your appropriation for carrying the mails may be expended in the first six months of the year.

You may cut down the amount required to pay the mail-carriers, and yet these men have to be employed or the transportation of the mails is to stop; and during the first six months of the year the whole money is expended, and then you are confronted with the condition of things that requires you either to give more money for the payment of their salaries or you close the postal service. And this condition of things may occur with reference to many items which are carried by this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. While the gentleman pauses I would like to direct his attention to the insertion in the last appropriation bill in reference to the Government Printing Office of the provision that there should not be more than half the money appropriated by the bill expended by that bureau for the first six months of the year, and one-fourth of it in the third quarter, and the remaining fourth in the last quarter of the year. Now, I commend that legislation, and wish to see that same principle carried into every bureau, so that no reckless expenditures will be authorized or attempted in any one portion of the year which will necessitate a deficiency, but that the appropriation shall be gradually expended throughout the year in the manner specified by the law making it. That is the only way in my judgment that you can prevent deficiencies. We have presented to us to-day in the Committee on Appropriations seven millions of deficiencies for the current year.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no doubt of that; and if those deficiencies, those sums of money that are asked for, are unnecessary—for this presenting of deficiencies is no new thing—I have no doubt they will be refused by the Committee on Appropriations.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that I was the author of the legislation to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania referred.

Mr. RANDALL. And which meets my most earnest approval.

Mr. HISCOCK. I believe in making specific appropriations, and I say it without fear of successful contradiction, that the last Congress did more in the direction of specific appropriations than had been done by all the Democratic Congresses which preceded it. The policy had been adopted by a Democratic Congress of making lump appropriations. I remember a provision which was brought in by the Committee on Appropriations providing for the lumping of the appropriations for the entire clerk-hire of all the governmental Departments at Washington; and I remember, sir, that the Republicans resisted it in the Committee on Appropriations. And yet it was put through as a party question. But when we came into power, under the leadership of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who I am glad to know is now upon the Committee on Appropriations, we changed the whole policy, making specific appropriations, providing the number of clerks that could be employed, giving to the Departments and to each Department a certain number, and under his bill it was utterly impossible to employ more than the specified number and thus create a deficiency.

Mr. Chairman, I must again recur to the refusal to appropriate for the armament of the new vessels, and I hope before this discussion is ended we shall hear from the other side, somewhat in full and explanatory of their purpose and policy; and I hope that my colleague from New York and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will both be heard from. Can they tell us that it is not true that the refusal to give this money will keep the vessels out of commission for just so long a time as you delay it? Is it not true that you might just as well refuse to appropriate for the vessels themselves for the next fiscal year as to fail to appropriate for their armament? Is not that the fact? The Secretary of the Navy has sent here a letter, Mr. Chairman, from which you can draw no other inference. It asserts unequivocally that the refusal to give this money absolutely delays the putting of these vessels into commission. Taking these facts altogether, this increasing of the number of old wooden ships, old wooden hulks, upon which you can expend money, and the refusal to provide armament for the new vessels, and can you draw any other inference therefrom than that it is the intention of the Democratic majority to stop here and now the building of new ships?

I congratulate the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY] upon the position he has taken, and I hope, sir, that there may be found other gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber to unite with the Republican minority here and defeat what seems to be the purpose of the Committee on Appropriations, and to that end properly amend their bill.

I must not pass from this question too hastily. I believe that when the question was under discussion the other day the gentleman from Pennsylvania called the attention of this House to the fact that we could use upon the new ships the armament which is now upon the old wooden vessels. Is that the excuse for the policy portrayed by this bill? Is that the policy which is to prevail here? Will he tell us those old guns can be adapted to that purpose? Will he prove to us they can be so used?

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, if I understood him, contemplates that. I could understand it if the suggestion came from some other quarter. But that the representatives of the commercial interests of the great Atlantic seaboard should suggest such an idea, and thus seek to defend a bill which has concealed in its provisions this purpose of stopping the good work which we inaugurated, and as to which we told you how we could save the money to carry it on, passes my comprehension. Coming from such a source, I must confess my most unbounded surprise.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in this matter of appropriating money I am something of an economist. I believe, sir, I was commended by the other side of the House during the Forty-seventh Congress for my position upon that question, and I have never heard any member of Congress upon either side charge me with extravagance. I have been told, sir, that I patterned too much after the example of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in the past——

Mr. RANDALL. That is a mistake.

Mr. HISCOCK. That I adopted too many of his economical notions.

Mr. RANDALL. That is a mistake. I followed the gentleman in my vote in committee against giving any additional money to the completion of the ironclads, which he opposed at the last session.

Mr. HISCOCK. What is the mistake?

Mr. RANDALL. The mistake is in your saying you followed me, when I followed you by refusing to vote in the committee to appropriate any money to build the monitors.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am speaking not with reference to my having followed the gentleman in the last House or his having followed me. I am trying, Mr. Chairman, to pay a tribute to myself [laughter] by saying that here on the floor and among my friends the most serious charge that has ever been brought against me was that I patterned too much after the economical notions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL. You are always safe in doing that.

Mr. HISCOCK. Therefore it was we brought the naval bill down to the lowest possible figure when we presented it to the last Congress, and as it passed the House it was uncriticised. There were amendments to it in the Senate that I opposed, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania followed my lead, he says. I believe he did. We were of the same mind upon that question then. Undoubtedly we are of the same mind now.

Having said this much with reference to myself and with reference to the past legislation upon this subject, I am compelled to express my profound surprise and my deep regret that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should allow his committee to take advantage of this legislation recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, of which we were the authors, which we gave to the country for the purpose of building up a new navy and giving to the country these new ships—that he should allow his committee to take that advantage and retard and delay the work for the single purpose of reducing the appropriation bill a million of dollars for the next fiscal year—not saving a dollar, bear in mind—in a vain effort to obtain a character for economy.

Let us look at the appropriations for the Navy for a few years past.

For the fiscal year 1876 the appropriations for the Navy were $18,000,000; in 1877, reduced to $14,000,000; in 1878, increased to $19,000,000; in 1879, reduced to $14,250,000; in 1881, $15,250,000; in 1882 they were nearly $15,000,000. In each of these years the Democrats had this House. No new ships were given to the country. Money was expended upon old wooden hulks—expended in the manner I have described, and costing more than they were worth for their repair. For 1883 we gave less than $16,000,000 to the Navy; for 1884, $16,500,000, about the average which had been estabished by the preceding Democratic Houses, and $2,320,000 of the appropriations for 1884 was to build new ships.

I do not care to weary the committee. My reason for recurring to this matter of the new ships is to impress upon the committee this threatened change of policy.

Mr. Chairman, very briefly I will call your attention to one or two items of this proposed appropriation bill which seem to me to be subjects of proper criticism. I call attention to the item "Navigation." And either in this general debate or when the bill is taken up for amendment under the five-minute rule I trust we shall hear some explanation from the other side giving a reason why the appropriation has been reduced.

Mr. RANDALL. I will give it to you now if you want it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I shall be happy to hear it.

Mr. RANDALL. Last year the appropriation for that object was $100,000. The officer in charge of that Department said there was a saving in the matter of pilotage in the employment of pilots in foreign waters of $37,000; but that instead of saving it to the Government he had used it, perhaps properly, for the purchase of other articles not embraced in the clause. We therefore took $37,000 from the $100,000, leaving $63,000, and added $12,000 more; so that practically for the objects originally mentioned in that paragraph we have given $12,000 more to that fund than was expended for the items enumerated therein last year.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, will the gentleman tell the committee the purpose for which that amount of $37,000 was expended?

Mr. RANDALL. It was expended very usefully, no doubt; but not under the specification made of it when we passed the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's explanation would be complete——

Mr. RANDALL. I think it is complete.

Mr. HISCOCK. It would be complete if he would state to the committee the purposes for which that was expended.

Mr. RANDALL. I have said that I believe it was expended for useful purposes, but not coming within the range of articles specified to be paid for out of that appropriation.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania say that it was not within the range of the purposes of the appropriation, that the money could not be properly expended for the purpose to which it was applied?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not say that technically it could not be expended, because there may have been at the end of the section some discretion given. But I do say, and the officer in charge of the bureau will not contradict it, that he did go beyond the range of expectation, because he did not anticipate that he could save that money, and he purchased things which he did not at that time anticipate buying.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman's explanation has been incomplete. I understand this from the Secretary of the Navy, that so inadequate an appropriation had been made in times past for this purpose that the Department were without compasses, and I believe without charts. This money was expended for supplies of that nature. The Department was so far reduced in such supplies for the equipment of vessels that they could not be sailed with safety.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. HISCOCK. Hear me through.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no deficiency at all asked for this year, showing that the $100,000, or rather the $63,000, was adequate.

Mr. HISCOCK. It was absolutely necessary, as I was told by the Secretary of the Navy, and I am confirmed in that by the gentleman from Illinois, a member of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON], it was absolutely necessary for the good of the service that the Department should have more supplies in the way of compasses, &c.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, why did you not give it to them, then?

Mr. HISCOCK I will answer that question before I get through. They said it was necessary that they should have these articles for the safety of the ships and for the safety of the men on the ships. The Secretary of the Navy told the Committee on Appropriations that he was intending to save in this matter of pilotage. We were fully advised of that when we gave this sum of money. And he now says that although he has saved that sum of money he needs the $100,000 for the purpose of maintaining this branch of the service; and more than that, he says that he can point out the items upon which he proposes to expend it.

Mr. RANDALL. And the Secretary of the Navy in the same relation says that he requires $8,000,000 more than we have given him.

Mr. HISCOCK. And he tells you what he proposes to do with it, and Congress has the right to refuse money for those objects, but you propose to give for this; you recognize its propriety but refuse to give enough; reducing the appropriation in this way takes ships out of commission. Reduce this appropriation to $75,000, and you will take ships out of commission. Are you willing to take that responsibity? [The chairman raised his gavel.] I have been somewhat interrupted and I hope I will be indulged with a little more time.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the gentleman have as much time as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HISCOCK. From 1875 to 1882 this item of appropriation ranged from $115,000 to $111,000, a Democratic House in each Congress. In the Forty-seventh $100,000 was adopted as the minimum that could be appropriated for this purpose.

I served upon the Committee on Appropriations during those Congresses under a very economic chairman; and I aided that chairman in the making up of this naval appropriation bill. We were never able to reduce the amount for this purpose below $111,000.

Now, does the gentleman explain this reduction by saying that the Secretary of the Navy has presented to Congress extraordinary estimates with reference to certain other items? It is the business of the Committee on Appropriations to go through the items of expenditures, to audit the acounts of the Department, if you please, and to look into what will be required for the coming fiscal year, examine and tell what items they refuse to allow for and what allow for, giving a sufficient sum of money for that which is necessary only.

I call attention to the appropriation for equipment and recruiting. The amount appropriated for that purpose in 1875 was $1,140,000; in 1876, $1,325,000; in 1877, $1,045,000; in 1878, $935,000; in 1879, $850,000; in 1880, $868,000; in 1881, $873,000; in $1882, $910,000; in 1883, $825,000; and in 1884, $889,000. I will ask the gentleman how much is proposed in this bill for this item?

Mr. RANDALL. The appropriation last year was $800,000, and we propose this year $700,000. I can give the gentleman the reason for that if he wishes it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. Of that item, $350,000 goes for the purchase of coal, &c.; for the purchase of other articles, $150,000, and for labor in the yards, &c., $200,000. The amount appropriated was reduced $200,000 last year because the Secretary chose to close a number of the navy-yards. And he asserts distinctly that unless Congress shall reverse its action in that particular he will continue to keep them closed, including, I am sorry to say, the navy-yard near where I live, that of League Island. But if these yards are to be closed, the reduction can be relatively made without any difficulty whatever.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now will the gentleman from Pennsylvania in this connection tell the committee the purposes to which this appropriation is devoted?

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman can read the estimates or the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the gentleman to state to the committee the purposes for which this appropriation is made.

Mr. RANDALL. I will cause the paragraph to be read, if the gentleman wishes.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly; cause it to be read. I would like the gentleman to state the purposes to which this money is devoted.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has the bill before him, has he not?

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, yes; but the gentleman says this matter depends upon the closing of the navy-yards.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say that it depends upon the number of ships in commission.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the Clerk to read a paragraph from the bill. I do this for the accommodation of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT AND RECRUITING.

For equipment of vessels: For coal for steamers' and ships' use, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling; hemp, wire, hides, and other materials for the manufacture of rope and cordage; iron for the manufacture of anchors, cables, galleys, and chains; canvas for the manufacture of sails, awnings, bags, and hammocks; heating apparatus for receiving-ships; and for the purchase of all other articles of equipment at home and abroad, and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels and manufacture of equipment articles in the several navy-yards, $700,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, will the gentleman be so good as to tell the committee how that sum depends at all upon the closing of navy-yards?

Mr. RANDALL. It says so in so many words.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It is simply for the supply of vessels; and I must confess my surprise that a bill has been brought in here containing an item with reference to which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is unable to state to the Committee of the Whole the purposes for which the money is to be expended. This appropriation has nothing to do with navy-yards.

Mr. RANDALL. We had an estimate from the Department, by which it appeared that more than $100,000 of the previous appropriation had been spent in labor at navy-yards. Hence it was a mere matter of arithmetical calculation to reach the sum named in the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say that this item does not depend upon the closing of a single navy-yard. It has nothing to do with the closing of navy-yards.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the gentleman differs with the Department.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly not, and by the terms of this bill the money is to be expended in supplies to ships which are to go into commission or which are now in commission.

Mr. RANDALL. That is part of it, no doubt.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is the entire sum.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is the entire sum, and if the gentleman will procure the items of expenditure for the current or the last fiscal year he will find that I am right in my assertion.

Mr. RANDALL. I have an estimate from the Department showing that more than $100,000 of the previous appropriation was spent for labor in the yards.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know but the gentleman has such an estimate?

Mr. RANDALL. You do not deny that I have?

Mr. HISCOCK. No, sir, I certainly will not deny it; but I will assert that the gentleman has no letter, no estimate, which makes the expenditure of this money to depend upon the keeping open or the closing of the yards. It is not devoted to the maintenance of yards at all. The appropriation for those purposes is made in other provisions of the bill. This appropriation refers simply to ships which are in commission or which are to be put in commission.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has undertaken to explain this reduction to us. I hope that when this item of the bill shall be reached he will be able to tell the committee whether I am right or wrong in this particular, and to verify, if he can, the statement he has made here. I am very sure that I am right.

In this connection let me read:

For the year ending June 30, 1883, the appropriation "equipment of vessels" was reduced to $750,000, although no reduction was made in the number of vessels in commission, and the amount estimated and reserved for the payment of their running expenses was found, when the accounts of the several paymasters came to be settled, to be insufficient for the purpose by $49,700.96, as appears by the annual report of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, who will report a deficiency of that amount for the settlement of the accounts.

During the present fiscal year the number of vessels fitted for sea has been much larger than heretofore, and the number in commission also largely increased; in consequence of the additional expense of fitting out and maintaining this increase, the appropriation for the current fiscal year will be completely exhausted, leaving nothing for the purchase of hemp, of which but little remains on hand, nor the replenishing of foreign coaling stations, which are also greatly in need of supplies of coal, no foreign shipments having been made during the last or present fiscal years, owing to the insufficiency of the appropriations.

These deficiencies will all have to be supplied from the appropriation for the next fiscal year, and the amount named in the bill, $700,000, is entirely inadequate for the purpose.

The expenditure for labor in fitting out and equipping vessels under this bureau, including repairs, and the manufacture of rope and other articles to meet the requirements of the service at the several navy-yards amounts to about $300,000 per annum; the expenses abroad of vessels in commission amount to about $300,000, leaving but $100,000 for the purchase of hemp, coal for home consumption and for shipment to foreign stations, and all other supplies pertaining to this bureau.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a memorandum furnished me from the Navy Department. I would not for a moment have gentlemen on the other side think I am unwilling to have reduced the amount carried by an appropriation bill. I am indifferent to the amount reported if it is required by the needs of the service and cut down to the actual needs of the Government. But, sir, I do not believe in the policy of ascertaining the amount appropriated at a former session of Congress and then reducing that amount a million of dollars arbitrarily. That is not the way to provide for a great government like this. That is not the policy which should be pursued by statesmen. It is not a policy which will reflect credit on the dominant power of any House.

The people are entirely willing that money be expended, only requiring it shall be well expended. They do not believe in a starvation policy. They do not believe in the appropriation of money for worthless and improper objects. But, sir, I have never known a constituency which would not indorse its Representative for voting for an appropriation if it were a wise one.

I have consumed more time than I intended. I have pointed out a few of the reductions in the pending bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has attempted to explain them. I have called attention to some facts which I believe indicate the policy of the Committee on Appropriations, and I shall be glad to have this general debate go on until gentlemen on the other side can make the fullest explanation.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of the latitude of a general debate to discuss the question, whether the present policy of appropriating money each year for telegraphic service to be rendered by private corporations should be perpetuated. This bill contains eleven different appropriations for such service, which will mainly be performed by the Western Union Company. Each of the thirteen general appropriation bills will contain similar provisions; and for a quarter of a century we have been appropriating indefinite sums to each one of the many Departments and bureaus of the Government for telegraphing. What aggregate amount was paid by the United States to the Western Union even last year alone no man in Congress knows, but it must have been large. And beyond all question the whole amount paid by Government to telegraph companies has been far greater than the cost of building all such lines on the continent. I have no doubt whatever that the amount received from the national Treasury by the Western Union in any five years has been greater than the actual cash paid up by its stockholders.

What has thus been true in the past will certainly and quickly be repeated in the future, unless there be a change in the present policy. And while that which I now desire to say would be equally pertinent to any other general appropriation bill, yet it is precisely germane to the one before us. This constant drain for telegraphing through scores of little vents has not heretofore been deemed worthy of notice in the general debate, yet believing as I do that our present practice rests upon a false principle, and that this question of public economy is of greater moment to the Government and the people than are several other topics which have been dwelt upon, I take the first occasion for calling the attention of the House to the query: Whether, instead of making heavy and indefinite appropriations for telegraphic service rendered by private corporations, year after year and decade after decade, it may not be cheaper, wiser, and better for Government to build and operate lines of its own?

THE OBJECTIONS TO A POSTAL TELEGRAPH STARTED BY THE WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

That is a broad question and suggests many others, more than I have time even to mention; but they will be covered by one of three main propositions:

1. Has Congress the legal power under the Constitution to establish and operate telegraph lines as a part of the postal system of the United States?

2. If it has, should this power be exercised?

3. And if so, which of the many proposed ways of establishing a postal telegraph would be least objectionable and most efficient?

Weeks before Congress met the president of the Western Union published in the North American Review an elaborate article denying the first and second of these propositions. A marked copy was sent free to each Senator and Representative. (I do not know who paid for them.) He labored to show that the establishment of a postal telegraph would be unconstitutional, inequitable, impolitic, and dangerous to the liberties of the people. Many of the daily papers, which are more or less dependent on the Western Union for the rates paid for press news, even if there be no stronger bond of union, re-echoed the cry, and thousands of persons not familliar with the real situation and with the ramified and sweeping power of that corporation have suddenly become doubtful as to the feasibility of or necessity for a postal telegraph. No illustration of the grip which that monopoly has upon the nerve system of national intelligence can be stronger than is furnished by the effect upon public sentiment, and especially in this building, of the fallacious article published by Dr. Norvin Green. Nothing could be clearer than the purpose of this salaried official of the most powerful and ambitious monopoly in America to forestall the action of Congress on proposed legislation. No brief by a corporation attorney could be less disinterested or more distorted. And to me it is marvelously surprising that in view of these facts so many gentlemen have willingly swallowed his story and gravely retail his objections, as if they were not only true but axiomatic.

With a love for fair play I ask the indulgence of the House to make a few suggestions on the people's side.

IS A POSTAL TELEGRAPH CONSTITUTIONAL?

As to the question of unconstitutionality, the Supreme Court in the Pensacola case (96 United States Reports), seven years ago, went as far toward affirming the power of Congress to operate a postal telegraph as it properly could go in a case which did not present that point in issue. It declares that Congress may assume the telegraph as a part of the postal service, and only reserves an opinion on the point whether Congress may not "exclude all others from its use." I quote the whole paragraph:

> Since the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden (9 Wheaton, 1) it has never been doubted that commercial intercourse is an element of commerce which comes within the regulating power of Congress.
>
> Post-offices and post-roads are established to facilitate the transmission of intelligence. Both commerce and the postal service are placed within the power of Congress, because, being national in their operation, they should be under the protecting care of the National Government.
> The powers thus granted are not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce or the postal service known or in use when the Constitution was adopted, but they keep pace with the progress of the country and adapt themselves to the new developments of time and circumstance. They extend from the horse with its rider to the stage-coach, from the sailing vessel to the steamboat, from the coach and the steamboat to the railroad, and from the railroad to the telegraph, as these new agencies are successively brought into use to meet the demands of increasing population and wealth. They were intended for the government of the business to which they relate at all times and under all circumstances.
> As they were intrusted to the General Government for the good of the nation, it is not only the right but the duty of Congress to see to it that intercourse among the States and the transmission of intelligence are not obstructed or unnecessarily encumbered by State legislation.
>
> The electric telegraph marks an epoch in the progress of time. In a little more than a quarter of a century it has changed the habits of business and become one of the necessities of commerce. It is indispensable as a means of intercommunication, but especially is it so in commercial transactions.
>
> The statistics of the business before the recent reductions in rates show that more than 80 per cent. of all the messages sent by telegraph related to commerce. Goods are sold and money paid upon telegraphic orders. Contracts are made by telegraphic correspondence, cargoes secured, and the movement of ships directed.
>
> The telegraphic announcement of the markets abroad regulates prices at home, and a prudent merchant rarely enters upon an important transaction without using the telegraph freely to secure information. It is not only important to the people but to the Government. By means of it the heads of the Departments in Washington are kept in close communication with all their various agencies at home and abroad, and can know at almost any hour, by inquiry, what is transpiring anywhere that affects the interests they have in charge.
> Under such circumstances it can not for a moment be doubted that this powerful agency of commerce and intercommunication comes within the controlling power of Congress, certainly as against hostile State legislation. In fact, from the beginning, it seems to have been assumed that Congress might aid in developing the system; for the first telegraphic line of any considerable extent ever erected was built between Washington and Baltimore, only a little more than thirty years ago, with money appropriated by Congress for that purpose (5 Statutes, 618); and large donations of land and money have since been made to aid in the construction of other lines (12 id., 489, 772; 13 id., 365; 14 id., 292).
> It is not necessary to inquire whether Congress may assume the telegraph as part of the postal service and exclude all others from its use. The present case is satisfied if we find that Congress has power, by appropriate legislation, to prevent the States from placing obstructions in the way of its usefulness.

Subsequent to the publication of Dr. Green's article, Postmaster-General Gresham, who has long been recognized as an able jurist, carefully investigated the whole legal question, and in his late report says:

> I have reached the conclusion that Congess has the constitutional power in providing for the postal service of the country to avail itself of all the facilities devised by the inventive genius of modern times for transmitting messages and intelligence, and that it has full authority to buy or build lines.

His predecessor, Postmaster-General Howe, whose judicial acumen has rarely been equaled, said in his report for 1882:

> After the fullest consideration I have been able to give the subject I am forced to the conclusion that the time has fully come when the telegraph and postal service should be embraced under one management.
> The business of the telegraph is inherently the same as that of the mail. It is to transmit messages from one person to another. That is the very purpose for which post-offices and post-roads are established. The power to establish is not limited to any particular modes of transmission. The telegraph was not known when the Constitution was adopted; neither was the railway. I can not doubt that the power to employ one is as clear as to employ the other.

The proposition will strike the average mind as indisputable, that Government may constitutionally possess and operate a telegraph wire in the same legal sense that it may own and handle the sacks in which it transports mail-matter, or that it may by its own corps of carriers distribute letters from a post-office to private residences, or that it may transact a banking business by issuing and paying the drafts termed money-orders, or that it may conduct the most extended express business on the continent, and perform the service of a common carrier of general merchandise, embracing articles from garden seeds to whiffletrees and dress patterns to Florida alligators. It is doing these things to-day and in accordance with the Constitution. And if it may legally own such property, employ men, and perform such service, then most certainly may it legally own and operate a telegraph wire.

A QUESTION OF CASH AND NOT OF CONTSITUTIONALITY.

The insincerity of Dr. Green's allegation to the contrary is vividly exposed by his chief object, which he states thus:

> But if it be determined that the Government shall enter upon a public telegraph service, then it has acquired the right and is under obligation to take the existing telegraph properties in the country at valuation, as provided in the act of 1866.

In other words, if Government builds lines of its own and competes with the Western Union, then a postal telegraph is unconstitutional; but if it buys the Western Union property at $80,000,000, then a postal telegraph is or may be constitutional. So that after all the issue is not one of legal power, but of $80,000,000. This "constitutional" dodge has been so frequently played on so many different measures and so often exposed, that I turn from it with the remark that the ardent solicitude for the integrity of the Constitution evinced by the Western Union, the Standard Oil Company, the land-grant railroad burglars, and the whole host of corporation pirates would be amusing if it were not so nauseatingly disgusting, and possibly warrants the hope that this noble charter of liberty, which had a mighty hard time before they were born, will yet now and in some feeble way manage to straggle down the centuries.

INCREASE OF GOVERNMENT PATRONAGE.

But the objection to a postal telegraph most frequently urged, and seemingly with some effect, is that it would increase the number of Government employés, and thus endanger the liberties of the people. The premise is true, the inference false. Dr. Green puts it thus:

* * * The genius of our Government is that the people rule; it is therefore adverse to the administrative power, for the time being, having any such advantage in directing or controlling the popular will. The telegraph (postal) would not only double the power, by way of patronage, of the Post-Office Department, but would give the administration party immense advantages in warmly contested elections. Who can say that sooner or later there would not be espionage of telegrams instituted? But even were it administered with the most sacred impartiality and inviolability of the privacy of messages, the opposing party would never believe it was so administered, and would not venture to use it in the private arrangements for the prosecution of the contest.

The employment of operators by Government would certainly augment the public force, just as does the hiring of any additional clerks; but how will this increase jeopardize the liberties of the people? Let us examine into that.

The dangers which lurk and inhere in every telegraph system, alike whether it be operated by Government or by a private corporation, must be either internal or external; that is, either exist in the opportunity for "an espionage [and betrayal] of telegrams," or in the efficiency of operators as an organized force in community.

No man can be more familiar with the facts in the case than is Dr. Green. He has had long experience as the autocrat of the telegraph. His opportunities for exact observation have been unequaled. He must be conversant with the possibilities of utilizing confidential telegrams for a purpose different from that of the sender. He has studied the efficiency of an organized telegraph force as a political engine, and discovers in it a power which, if wielded by Government, would threaten the nation's liberties. But may not his opinion be warped by the obligations of his official position?

ESPIONAGE OF TELEGRAMS.

As to those dangers which are internal, and which in the nature of things must inhere in every telegraph system, it is clear that if the volume of business after the opening of a postal telegraph were no greater than at present the same number of persons would be required to handle it. Suppose all of these persons now to be in the employ of the Western Union, and dependent for bread and butter upon the will of, say, Dr. Green; but that, after the establishment of the postal telegraph, one-half would be in Government and one-half in Western Union employ. If those men can be used as spies, or as a political machine, then Dr. Green may now so use the whole of them for the avaricious purposes of his monopoly, and by so doing may far more seriously endanger the liberties of the people than if his power were reduced one-half, or than, on the worst supposition, if his half were counteracted by the Government's half. Of Dr. Green personally I have nothing unkind or ungenerous either to say or to insinuate. But in the Western Union and in its corporate character I have no more confidence than I have in a rattlesnake—not a whit more.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I desire to know, as I am not at all familiar with the rules of this House, whether it is proper that a speech upon the Western Union Telegraph should be made when a question of the naval appropriation bill is before the House; and if it is in order, whether it is because of the watered stock of that company that it comes in under the question of a naval appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maine that the House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Kansas has the right under the practice of the House to discuss any matter that he chooses.

Mr. ANDERSON. And the swiftness and owlish solemnity with which he insinuates that "sooner or later an espionage of telegrams would be instituted" by Government, and that a postal telegraph would become a dangerous political engine, certainly justifies the query whether the Western Union telegraph is now or ever has been so used?

Does he speak from official knowledge or simply as a philosophic observer of abstract possibilities? If from the former, then I for one would infinitely prefer to trust any political party whom the people shall place in power with one-half the telegraphic facilities and force of the continent than to trust Mr. Jay Gould with the whole of them; and I venture the assertion that 50,000,000 of Americans feel exactly the same way. But if he speaks merely as a philosopher, then while admiring the disinterested patriotism which impels him to ring out a warning, yet I can not share his vivid apprehensions of danger to the people's liberties from a Government telegraph.

Are not the people themselves the real government? Do not the majority of them compose the "administration party?" Do not the people make and unmake the officers who for the time being constitute the administration? Will not the people be safer in the hands of men whom they select every two or four years than to be solely and absolutely in the hands of men whom Mr. Gould and other owners of the Western Union exclusively select?

If it be "the genius of our Government that the people rule," how can that genius be "adverse" to a Government telegraph, which would break Mr. Gould's absolute rule through the Western Union monopoly? Is he "the people?" And if a telegraph system is inherently a dangerous engine, should not the people at once take it wholly into their own hands and out of Mr. Gould's hands? At any rate, would not their liberties be better conserved by the establishment of a postal wire over which they might send tidings without the possibility of espionage by Western Union employés, rather than as now over Western Union wires alone? These questions answer themselves; and the answers conclusively show that so far as internal elements are concerned the liberties of the people would not be endangered by a postal telegraph.

On the other hand, they would be preserved against existing dangers; because the real issue to-day is not whether a postal telegraph can be freed from the possibility that an operator may know and betray the contents of a message, or the resultant possibility of an espionage of telegrams by his employer. These possibilities, being inherent in all telegraphs, are as true of the Western Union as of every other line, and the guards against them in the form of "ciphers" would be just as effective on the Government's wires as they are on Western Union wires—no more, no less. But the exact issue to-day, since telegraph lines do exist and will be used, is whether a postal operator would be as trustworthy as is a Western Union operator; whether the danger of espionage by men responsible to the people would be any greater than by men responsible alone to Mr. Gould; whether the public shall have at least one line on which private individuals can not exercise the right to place operators whom they may use as spies, or whether corporation czars shall furnish the only lines on the continent and alone select the operating force. That is the real issue.

A POSTAL OPERATOR CONTROLLING AN ELECTION.

But perhaps the dangers are external, and are to be found in telegraph employés as an organized force acting on society, and I wish to ascertain, if possible, the real power of postal operators, appointed under civil-service rules, as a factor in partisan politics, and whether that power may become dangerous to the Republic; because Dr. Green assures us that there are dangers somewhere, and as they are not internal, they must be external.

Standing upon the eminence of his vast experience and looking down upon the busy population of the continent, his eye rests upon a town of say 5,000 persons, having 1,000 voters and a post-office, in which are two Government operators, one for day and the other for night service. On election morning his prophetic soul discovers that pale-faced but bloody-minded night operator, after twelve hours on duty, rallying at the polls and savagely tearing the liberties of the people into tatters by ruthlessly compelling the thousand voters to deposit the ballot indicated by the administration party. And this fiendish outrage would actually be accomplished were it not for the gallantry of Dr. Green, who, rushing to the rescue, with the Constitution of the United States in one hand and the flag of the Western Union, starry with "franks," in the other, leaps between those hundreds of defenseless American citizens and that terrible desperado of an operator, and bids him "Avaunt ye!" while Mr. Gould silently continues to gather in the Western Union ducats. There's patriotism for you, and likewise "richness!" If the lobby of the Western Union can prevent it, that bloodthirsty operator shall not surround and capture any regiment of Americans anywhere!

Now, I do not undervalue the destructive force of that Gatling gun of an operator as a power in partisan politics, but concede that Dr. Green is right as to him! And in my district there would be, if the postal telegraph were established, just about twenty such bristling political pirates—only at least ten of them would be girls. But where it seems to me that Dr. Green is mistaken is with respect to the sagacity and courage of the American people. There are over 160,000 of them in the district I have the honor to represent, and I really believe that those 160,000 Kansans would actually preserve their political liberties as against the whole twenty or even forty operators, especially as the girls would be apt to marry. And what is true in that district is precisely as true in all other districts. Even at the improbable rate of fifty operators to a district there would still be 3,000 people to one operator; and whenever 3,000 Americans can not defend their liberties as against one operator chaos may as well start on the rampage. Even to discuss such an absurdity seems to demand an apology.

INCREASE OF POSTAL EMPLOYÉS EXAGGERATED.

The only other possible avenue of danger to our liberties from a postal telegraph is in the power which would be given to the administration by the additional patronage; and over this dire possibility the Western Union lobby fairly shrieks.

The other day Dr. Green endeavored to convince the Post Office Committee of the Senate that if a postal telegraph were established, "within five years the Government would find itself with an army of 100,000 employés in the telegraphic service." He reaches this conclusion by supposing that the number of operators employed on the Western Union is "probably 30,000," and the number of messengers "a little army;" that the number of persons in telegraphic service employed by all railroad and telegraph companies is between 40,000 and 50,000; that a postal telegraph would double the present volume of business in four years, and that within five years it would have an army of 100,000 employés. Mr. Hubbard, who is an expert in telegraph history, punctured the statement that the number of Western Union operators is 30,000 by saying:

I suppose you have in your service somewhere about 8,000 or 10,000 operators?
Mr. GREEN. In the Western Union I think that is about the fact.

There is a difference of 266 per cent. between 8,000 and 30,000. And whether the basis of estimate is to be 30,000 operators or only 8,000 operators and whether the number of messengers is "a little army" or only 2,000, are points that must materially affect the accuracy of the "100,000" total of Government employés, and may reduce it to 26,000. As a sample of the sort of bosh which Mr. Gould's employés are trying to palm off on the American people as "facts," I extract from the statement of Dr. Green before the Senate's Post-Office Committee, January 31, 1884:

Mr. GREEN. * * * The number of employés in the present telegraph system is very difficult to ascertain. Under our contracts with railroad companies, out of 13,000 offices about 9,000 offices are open for the public for commercial business and social messages. Over 9,000 offices are maintained by the railroad companies, and the employés are the employés of the railroad companies.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Can you state how many employés, aside from those employed by the railroad companies, the Western Union has?
Mr. GREEN. I can not give you that exactly. * * * I should say, therefore, that there are probably 30,000 operators employed on the Western Union lines. There are probably 5,000 or 6,000 other employés engaged in constructing and maintaining the lines—superintendents, clerks, and officers.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HUBBARD. I suppose you have in your service somewhere about 8,000 or 10,000 operators?
Mr. GREEN. In the Western Union I think that is about the fact.
Senator PALMER. That is exclusive of your messengers?
Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.
Senator PALMER. How many messengers are employed?
Mr. GREEN. In the large cities there is a little army of them. I suppose we have 125 in one office in New York, and we have quite a number of them everywhere.
Mr. HUBBARD. About 2,000 messengers, I guess.

If his answer to Mr. Hubbard is correct, then the answer to the chairman's question is incorrect, and the 30,000 employés include those of the railroads as well as of the Western Union. But if this be the case, then certainly one-third of the operators are not engaged in transmitting public messages, because of the whole 13,000 offices reported by the Western Union 4,000 are exclusively railroad offices and not open to the public. Of the 9,000 offices which are so open, 5,000 are maintained by the roads and 4,000 by the Western Union. In these 5,000 offices, maintained primarily for railroad business and only incidentally for public messages, the time of a postal operator, were these offices transferred to a post-office, would not be fully employed. He would have as much time for routine post-office business as the present operator has for railroad messages and station-agent work. In other words, the postmaster or his clerk would also be an operator. And just to this extent the number of Government employés and the amount of patronage would not be increased; the only difference would be that in addition to their present qualifications the present post-office force would need the knowledge and skill of operators. So that the real increase would be equal to the 8,000 operators now employed in the 4,000 Western Union offices proper, with the 2,000 boys as messengers, and linemen, &c., say 13,000 all told. That would be on the average thirty-eight employés to a Congressional district of over 150,000 people, or one additional employé to each 4,000 Americans. There is a glaring difference between 13,000, or even 26,000, and "an army of 100,000 employés on the telegraph system."

GOVERNMENT "PATRONAGE" WHICH SAVED THE UNION.

But suppose it were 100,000. Would that rack the American Constitution or debauch the purity of the people? This generation has seen the day when the "patronage" of the Government was suddenly expanded by the appointment, equipment, and maintenance of 2,500,000 armed soldiers, by the building of a powerful navy, and by all the emergent necessities of the most colossal and expensive war of the century. For five years the continent shook beneath the tread not of operators nor of messenger boys, but of fierce warriors. And neither during the war nor at its close did these men jeopardize the nation, diminish the purity of the people, cool their love for the flag, or thwart the best interests of the Government. They saved the nation, they ennobled the people, they burnished the glory of the flag, and so endeared this Government to the American people that, after the strain of such a war, which only made it the stronger, it may safely risk the rack of 15,000 or even 100,000 postal employes, who would be just as true to it and to the people as were the two and a half millions of boys in blue.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when sifted, just this, and nothing more, is the terrible force of these two great objections to a postal telegraph so triumphantly vociferated by the Western Union lobby and so thoughtlessly re-echoed in this Capitol, namely, its "unconstitutionality" and that dare-devil of an operator with his coincident patronage. The first is not true in fact, and the second would be silly if it were not too densely stupid, because it rests on the assumption that the American voters are either dolts or cowards, or else that an administration quadrennially elected by them is stronger and more outlasting than are the people; and there is not a man on this floor who really believes any such rot, no matter how many Western Union franks he may have in his pocket.

HE WHO PLEADS EQUITY MUST FIRST DO EQUITY.

As to the rest of the Western Union allegations nobody even pretends to believe them, much less to retail them. Everybody knows that its stock is watered worse than city milk; that its charges are as uneven, usurious, and outrageous as unbridled rapacity can make them; that its profit on the average message, as shown by its own reports, is about 65 per cent. of its alleged expense; that in its relentless ambition to monopolize the telegraphy of the continent it has wrecked and destroyed millions of other people's property; that each year, like a vampire, it has sucked from its customers millions upon millions of dollars more than its service was fairly worth; and that, with its attorneys, its allies, its lobby, its franks, and its other resources, it triumphantly defies Congress, and laughs at the mere idea that a postal-telegraph bill can ever be enacted into a law. Were there no other reason for such enactment this alone should be sufficient to Representatives acting only as agents for the American people. On the matter of franks I extract from Senator HILL'S speech, as follows:

As to the attempted control of governmental action by the Western Union Company, it was boldly acknowledged by the president himself in his annual report for 1873 in the following language:
"The franks issued to Government officials constitute nearly one-third of the total complimentary business. The wires of the Western Union Company extend into thirty-seven States and nine Territories within the limits of the United States and into four of the British Provinces. In all of these our property is more or less subject to the action of the national, State, and municipal authorities, and the judicious use of complimentary franks among them has been the means of saving to the company many times the money value of the free service performed."
I do not need to assume the responsibility of charging the present existence of all the abuses which are possible, or even of those referred to, in the management of the telegraph. It will be sufficient for us to say, in the words of the late Postmaster-General Howe:
"Knowing that it can be so abused, it seems to be the dictate of prudence not to wait until it is so abused. It is an agency much too dreadful to be intrusted to private hands."

USURPATION OF POSTAL FUNCTIONS BY THE TELEGRAPH COMPANIES.

And now I desire to present a few facts which in my judgment render the immediate establishment of a postal telegraph imperatively necessary, not merely as a matter of convenience to the people, but as a measure of security to the Government and of public defense against the exercise by a virtual monopoly of the most dangerous power that can be wielded in a republic.

The Continental Congress declared the object and function of our postal system to be "the communicating intelligence with regularity and dispatch from one part to another of these United States." Intelligence may be communicated between persons by words spoken, written, or printed, and by signals. As to modes of conveyance, words may be taken to distant persons in mail-sacks or by telegraphic or telephonic wires. In fact, a word itself is nothing more than a mail-sack, containing the specific idea which that word is used to express. And as ideas are the essence and vitality of intelligence, and therefore the conveyance of ideas the very substance of the act of communicating intelligence, it is wholly immaterial what exact process of transmission is employed, whether that of sending the paper on which words are written or printed, that of signaling the word by telegraph, or sending it by telephone. The whole point and essence of communicating intelligence is the transmission of precise ideas.

The duty of conveying these communications between people widely separated is by the Constitution and statutes exclusively assigned to the United States Government, the reason being that not only the welfare of the people but the safety of the state itself may at times wholly depend upon the certainty, inviolability, and speed of such conveyal. To intrust to private individuals a work freighted with consequences that might vitally affect the whole people was deemed by the forefathers as dangerous to the Republic they planned so wisely and loved so well. Hence the conduct of the postal business was vested in the General Government as an absolute monopoly, and no person or even State may lawfully become a carrier of mails except as the authorized agent of the United States.

But it has happened in the march of civilization and since the adoption of the Constitution that the courier and the coach have been supplanted by the locomotive, and it by electricity. So that to-day by far the greater part of that intelligence which most vitally concerns the masses, and especially the commercial world, is transmitted by wire, and neither by rail nor coach. In every county on the continent the price which a farmer will receive for his products is regulated each day by telegraph, and in most of them every hour. Probably four-fifths of the whole business transacted in America turns upon the news flashed every few minutes over the wires, while nearly the whole of the news upon which the public breakfasts is contained in the dispatches.

I doubt if any man does or can realize the full extent of the inroad by the telegraph upon the postal system as the true and real conveyer of communication between the people, and the broad sweep of the usurpation by such companies of the constitutional functions of the Government to communicate intelligence. We have been, and are yet, asleep to the true situation. If the railroad companies when opening their roads had claimed the right to carry such intelligence as the people preferred to send by steam rather than by stage-coach, the penalty of the postal laws would have been quickly enforced, because the Government alone could rightfully carry letters. But now, when the people prefer to telegraph the words of a message rather than wait till the identical piece of paper on which those words are written is conveyed in a mail-bag, we find that the very work which the Constitution vests in Government alone is chiefly being performed by an unscrupulous corporation. What earthly difference does it make whether the original piece of paper goes so long as the words are conveyed? None whatever in effect. The real function of the postal system is the transmission of intelligence from one part of the country to another. And yet the telegraph companies, little by little, insidiously and increasingly, have usurped this function to such an extent that if the people were suddenly deprived of their wires and thrown back upon the United States mails alone it would be as if the sun should set at noon. Notwithstanding which fact the paid agents of these companies actually have the impertinence to tell Congress that the establishment of a postal telegraph would be "unconstitutional" and inexpedient.

AMERICAN TELEGRAPHY AND THE AMERICAN EDITOR.

The Western Union Company alone has 432,000 miles of wire, or enough to put seventeen different girdles about the globe. It has 13,000 offices, and likely 50,000,000 of our population are within five hours of a telegraph key. It transmitted last year more messages than the whole number of letters carried in United States mails in 1843. Its revenues last year were greater than that of the Post-Office Department in 1870. Not only is it the common carrier of important social communications, but it is well-nigh the exclusive carrier of commercial, political, and general intelligence. "The importance of its intelligence far exceeds the magnitude of its business;" and as compared with the postal system it is to-day the great carrier of those tidings on which the commercial prosperity of America pivots.

Because, wherever there is a Western Union office proper, near by is an alert sentinel of the veteran corps of the Republic, an American editor. Nothing escapes him, from the latest case of "didn't know it was loaded" or the condition of crops to the progress of a flood or the appearance of an epidemic. He is one of the countless eyes of the grandest army of news-gatherers the world has ever seen. Whether his paper be daily or weekly makes no difference. He is one of the corps, and let an event happen that the public ought to know, and he is as sure to telegraph it to the press as he is to accept a subscription for his paper. Every day he is on duty in every town and near each hamlet on the continent, and nothing of importance happens anywhere under the flag that is not gathered for the people and flashed by night to the news centers; while along the cables which dive beneath the gales and waves of ocean and clasp hands with the wires of all the continents the news of all nations are interchanged. The facilities for gathering and communicating intelligence are almost as universal, active, and wonderful as the sun's rays. They are as the clustered diamonds in the crown of the empress of modern genius. And no army could more safely rely upon the vigilance of its sentinels than may the American people upon the sagacity and fidelity of their news-gatherers and proclaimers—the American press.

CENSORSHIP OF THE ASSOCIATE PRESS.

The process of action is substantially this: Suppose several important events have happened to-day in Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado at points where there is not a daily paper. Editors of dailies are always agents of the press association which supplies their dispatches. The editor of a weekly at those points will telegraph the event to-night to the Associated Press. His message will go to Saint Louis, and be sifted by a sort of censor or manager of the Associated Press, who decides what shall appear, how much shall appear, and the precise form of its appearance. He may suppress or include what he pleases and may give just such color to an item as suits his fancy. And after thus deciding he telegraphs back to the Kansas dailies the dispatches which they publish to-morrow.

That is a sample of the continent. And I am informed that there are just three such censors who sit in judgment upon all the news gathered in the United States by the Associated Press—one at Saint Louis for the West and South, one at Chicago for the Northwest, and one at New York for the East and South. Whatever is telegraphed from the territory in his jurisdiction goes to that censor, and whatever appears in the papers of his territory is telegraphed to them by him. All the Western news which appears in the Eastern associate press dailies is first telegraphed to the New York censor by Saint Louis and Chicago, and he after revising their revision transmits it to these dailies. In addition he receives and puts in shape the Eastern items, and, what is often of more importance to the commercial, industrial, and agricultural interests of the West and South, formulates the cable news, suppressing, including, and phrasing it as he thinks best. And not only does he thus shape the dispatches for the Eastern press, but those respecting both Eastern and foreign intelligence for the Western and Southern press, which he wires to Saint Louis and Chicago.

These three censors—and it makes no difference about the exact number, the principle is the same—may discharge their momentous duties with the utmost honor, sagacity, and integrity; and then, again, they may not. But whether they do or do not, the power vested in them, and especially in the New York censor, is more startling, more dangerous, more cyclonic than the wildest despot of Europe ever dreamed it possible that one man could be permitted to wield.

POWER OF THE CENSORS TO INFLUENCE PUBLIC OPINION.

Because he who decides what news the American people shall read to-morrow and what they shall not read decides what the American people shall think to-morrow, shall feel, shall talk, shall act—it may be through many to-morrows. As the sun sweeps across the continent, and as America opens its daily, to devour the praise accorded, say, to one Congressman or the sneer at another, the "public opinion" of America as to those two men is forming. And that opinion is molded by the phraseology which either is or may be decided by one of the three censors. The coloring which is given to a fact often impresses men more than does the bare fact itself; and the power to give that color, as well as to wire or suppress the fact itself, is vested in the censors not only as to political intelligence, but as to the commercial, industrial, social—indeed, all the items of American and European news.

In comparison with the power of the New York censor the amplest power of the President of the United States in shaping public opinion is as a babe's breath to a tempest. In similar comparison, the power of Congress to enact laws and of the Supreme Court to interpret law is as the autumn leaf below the growing wheat of spring, on which presently men will feed their beliefs and make vigorous their action And this great people, liberty-loving to the very core, which would spend the last dollar before the freedom of the press should be forcibly abridged and would fight to the last hour before a king should supplant an elected President, finds itself to-day the reader of and the feeder on just what news the censors allow them to read and feed upon.

DANGER TO AMERICAN LIBERTY.

Who elects those censors? The people elect the whole range of officials from coroner to President. Have they any voice whatever in the choice of the New York censor, who may wield a greater practical influence than all the officials in all the States of the Union? Who employs and pays these censors? To whom are they responsible for the discharge of their momentous trust? At whose beck will they lose position and with it perhaps bread and butter? At the nod of the people? Oh, no! These gentlemen are chosen by the press association, composed of the associated dailies as a sort of a joint-stock company, and are said to be most excellent men.

Concede all the good things which can be said of them and of the gentlemen to whom they are responsible, yet the fact remains that such a power of censorship upon the news of the world before its transmittal to such a nation as ours, is dangerous to commerce, menacing to liberty, a cancer upon the body politic, and a monstrosity in civilization. Any monarchical government that should attempt to inaugurate such a system would be burnt to ashes by the flash of the lightnings of revolution. But it exists to-day in America as the logical sequence, the sweet flower, of that precious plant the Western Union monopoly!

POWER OF THE WESTERN UNION OVER THE ASSOCIATE PRESS AND ITS DAILIES.

Be it conceded also that there is not a substantial agreement by the Associated Press to oppose any telegraphic enterprise inimical to the Western Union Company—a postal telegraph, for instance. Not long ago there was such an agreement, as appears from the following:

[Private circular. Not for publication.]

CINCINNATI COMMERCIAL OFFICE, April 15, 1867.

To the MEMBERS OF THE WESTERN ASSOCIATED PRESS:

Your attention is invited to the clause in our contract with the telegraph company which forbids us to encourage or support any opposition or competing telegraph company. That clause was to the telegraph company a valuable consideration for the favorable terms upon which they contracted with us.

MURAT HALSTED,
Executive Committee W. A. Press.

And Dr. Green peremptorily refuses to produce copies of the existing contracts, though bidden so to do by authority of the United States Senate. But concede the statement that old things have passed away, and that the relation between the Associated Press and the Western Union is solely that of a patron and a common carrier, and that the press would defiantly resist any influence over it attempted to be exercised by the Western Union; still, what exact relation must in the nature of things exist between the two? If the Western Union should happen to demand the support of the Associated Press against, say, a postal telegraph, and if that association should rise in its might and, battling for the freedom of the press, should say "No!" Then what? Would not the Western Union have the power to say, "We will terminate our special rates, now averaging 6½ cents per hundred words" (Dr. Green's testimony), "and hereafter charge you the 48 cents for ten words which the average public pays?" How could the press association continue its business or how could the dailies afford to take dispatches? What other lines could the majority of the papers use? Is not the press association dependent for its very possibility of existence on the will of the Western Union? And as to the dailies, how long can a daily paper without dispatches live in competition with one having dispatches? There is not a daily paper in America which the Western Union can not kill within any twelve months if it so wishes. And no difference what the dailies might or might not do, the fact is that the Western Union has the power to muzzle many of them and to cripple all of them if it chooses to exercise that power. The security of the dailies, then, and of their readers, rests, not in competition, not in the laws of the nation regulating the charges of the Western Union as a common carrier, but in the alleged humanity and justice of the Western Union. It might use this power, but "it is too good to do so." Is that sufficient security?

THE MONOPOLY MUZZLE.

Many people do not estimate the high purposes and disinterested character of that corporation as does Dr. Green. For instance, it happened that for three years the Chicago Inter-Ocean had the lease of a private wire from here to Chicago, over which its correspondent sent full reports. Senator HILL a few weeks since delivered a very able speech favoring a postal telegraph, and it was telegraphed to the Inter-Ocean and published the next morning verbatim. The Murat Halsted circular was a part of it. That evening at 5 o'clock the correspondent was notified over the Baltimore and Ohio wire that the Western Union lease had expired. Did it really expire that day by lapse of life or did the Western Union withdraw the wire because of the publication of Senator HILL'S speech? Some of our city papers affirmed the latter, and so believing at the first opportunity I denounced it on this floor as an outrage. Afterward I was assured that it was only a coincidence and not at all a consequence, and that the Inter-Ocean manager had published a card to the effect that there was no difficulty whatever with the Western Union and that the most friendly relations existed. However, he leased a wire from the Baltimore and Ohio Company. And the question is whether the fact that his paper, in order to compete successfully, must also take several thousand words per day of Associated Press that only go over the Western Union wire, had anything to do with the friendliness of these relations? Was the withdrawal of the Western Union wire a consequence or merely a coincidence? If the latter only, I have nothing to say. But if the former, then the corporation which would so act toward a daily for publishing a speech delivered in the United States Senate ought to be abolished by law as an enemy to American liberty, and the responsible officer of the Western Union who executed that edict ought to be imprisoned as an assassin of the press. The mere fact that such a thing can be done is conclusive evidence of the need for a postal telegraph.

On this point Mr. Hubbard states as follows:

And how is it with the press news? The Western Union Telegraph Company and the Associated Press make a close corporation. I do not mean to say that to-day I know of any fault to be found with the management, but in discussing this question we must be guided by the experience of the past, and inquire what power this company can exert by learning what it has done in the past.

A few years ago two papers in San Francisco favored the postal telegraph. Their rates were raised. One of them died because it could not pay them. The other ceased to publish attacks on the Western Union, and was restored to good-fellowship.

A paper in Virginia several years ago criticised the reports that were sent to it. It was notified that if it published any criticism upon the reports they would be stopped.

A few years ago there was a criticism upon some action of Mr. Orton, the president of the Western Union. The next day, or the next but one, the rates of that paper were doubled. It ceased to receive any telegraphic dispatches because it could not pay for them.

The telegraph company can raise or reduce the rates. Its control over the press is therefore absolute. It has the power of life and death, for the telegraphic news is the vital breath of the daily newspaper. Such a power can not exist without its exerting a pernicious influence on public affairs, and every observant public man has long perceived the demoralizing influence of this powerful but subtle agency.

Let us consider the power of the telegraph as an educator of the people. The current history of the times is first given to the country through the telegraph. "Let me write the songs of the people, and I care not who makes the laws," is an old saying. Here it would be truer, if less poetical, to say that the man who rules the Associated Press is master of the situation; for if he has the ability to wield it, he has an instrument for shaping the opinions of the millions, which, by the constancy, universality, and rapidity of its action, defies competition. The events which take place in all business, political, and religious centers, together with the actions of public men and their imputed motives, are all presented simultaneously to the public, from ocean to ocean, through this instrumentality.

The agents who collect the news respond to the central authority at New York, and are subject to removal at its pleasure. Here is a power greater than any ever wielded by the French Directory, because in an era when public opinion is omnipotent it can give, withhold, or color the information which shapes that opinion at its pleasure. It may impart an irresistible power to the caprice of an individual, and the reputation of the ablest and purest public man may be fatally tainted in every town and village on the continent by a midnight dispatch. It is incompatible with public safety that such an exclusive power to speak to the whole public at the same moment upon every subject, and thus to create public opinion, should be under the absolute control of a corporation. The obstacles which the telegraph and these associations can throw in the way of any new journal amount to virtual prohibition against publishing a first-class, independent newspaper in the land, and thus the existing combination has possession of the exclusive privilege of making the first and, with many, the last impression of every event.

DANGER TO THE WEEKLY PAPERS.

Suppose now that a law were passed copyrighting press dispatches for forty-eight hours, what would be the effect on the weekly press, and how far would the possible power of the Western Union over the dailies be extended over the country press? Either the latter would have to do without the latest news or pay for them to the dailies—which would be profitable to the dailies. In the end the stronger weekly in a town would be forced into the combination. But when this occurred generally these weeklies would be as much within the possible power of the Western Union, of which Mr. Gould is said to be chief owner and controller, as are the dailies now. Is that a condition of things compatible with the public good or the public safety?

And yet precisely such a measure is pending in this House, and those who oppose it are denounced as "robbers." While there may be a possible ground for copyrighting an "editorial" as the product of an editor's brain, what ground is there for copyrighting, say, election returns or the news of Garfield's murder? Does the editor create news in the sense that an author creates a book? To my mind that measure is a glaring wrong, glittering with impertinence. And the weekly press of the nation had better wake up. If it will look far enough it will discover a very fine Italian hand manipulating the measure.

IS A POSTAL TELEGRAPH PRACTICABLE.

But now let us examine the question of practicability and see whether the establishment of a postal telegraph is feasible in view of its magnitude, of the great cost of net-working the continent with lines, and of the temper of Congress and the country respecting large expenditures of public money for new purposes.

That raises two cognate questions, the one of ways, the other of means. As to ways, Government might enter into contract either with new or existing companies for the transmission of postal telegrams; and, again, it might either buy existing lines or build new ones. As to means, it can appropriate the necessary money directly out of the Treasury, or it can procure it by issuing and selling United States bonds.

So far as this House is concerned the matter of practicability would mainly turn upon the largeness of the amount required and the mode by which it should be provided. Suppose the amount were $6,000,000 and the mode a bill making a direct appropriation from the Treasury; that bill would, in my judgment, be certainly defeated, and because of four quite different elements in antagonism: 1. Those opposed outright to a postal telegraph. 2. Those adverse to large appropriations for purposes not required by existing law. 3. Gentlemen of the majority who, recognizing that the Democratic party is responsible for legislation and appreciating the force of the "economy" plea, would say that while the measure might be right enough some day, yet their party can not afford to go into a Presidential campaign with a larger aggregate expenditure than that of the last Republican House, and therefore that appropriations must be kept down. 4. Those who would urge that as the whole people should not be taxed for the benefit of the relatively small number who use the telegraph, they should resist any appropriation for the benefit of a class.

THE WESTERN UNION GAME.

The Western Union lobby would ply these and many other arguments vigorously; and such of the papers as are substantially under contract to oppose everything adverse to that corporation, in consideration of obtaining press messages at lower rates than the public pays, would herald far and wide the cries: "Wasting the people's money!" "Grinding the poor man for the benefit of the autocrat who telegraphs!" "More Government patronage!" "Another fat job for contractors!" and whole broadsides of similar points; all of which the kind and thoughtful Dr. Green would probably gather and print in another pamphlet, like the one he has recently furnished us, in the shape of another "appendix, showing the reflex of newspaper criticism," and in the continuance of his previous generosity he would mail it to us, postage prepaid, that we might the more easily discover the drift of "public opinion!"

And somehow that suggests the old song:

"Will you walk into my parlor?"
Said the spider to the fly.

But whether the method of making a direct appropriation out of the Treasury be or be not the better one, as an abstract proposition, I believe that such a bill would certainly fail. The Western Union lobby has always been able to kill every measure which embodied this feature, and probably it always will. The power of that corporation in its own right, and the wonderful and ramified power of its allies, all the greater because hidden and unsuspected, has never been equaled in American history, and he who either overlooks or undervalues it as a dominant factor in the problem of legislative feasibility will in the end have cause to repent a vital mistake. And while I neither say nor believe that every gentleman who prefers the appropriation method to the bond method is at heart opposed to a postal telegraph, since men looking at the same object from different standpoints and with different intensity will form different conclusions, yet I do believe that if the Western Union could have its way as to the shaping of a postal-telegraph bill it would greatly prefer the appropriation method and resist the bond method. That would be its game, because it could more certainly defeat the bill, and because it has a large stock of ammunition saved from former battles over that same ground, in which it was always victorious.

A POSTAL TELEGRAPH CAN BE BUILT WITHOUT COSTING THE GOVERNMENT A DOLLAR!

It was because of this belief in part that in the bill H. R. 511, which I introduced in the last as in this Congress, the departure was taken from previous telegraph measures by adopting the bond method. It proposes an issue of $6,000,000 United States bonds at the lowest rate of interest, irredeemable for ten years, and payable at the rate of $300,000 in each one of the subsequent twenty years, the interest and principal to be paid out of the earnings of the postal telegraph. The proceeds obtained from the sale of these 10-30 bonds in open market would build and equip three trunk lines, which, with their branches and connections, would link together the capital of each State and every free-delivery post-office, besides hundreds of smaller offices, and would at once place the Government in possession of its own facilities for reaching all the thickly-settled portions of its territory.

Every one familiar with the enormous profits of the telegraph business knows to a certainty that the earnings of a postal telegraph would far more than meet the interest, and after ten years annually redeem one-twentieth of the principal. During the last seventeen years, in many of which the Western Union has been under keen competition and at great expense in buying out rival lines, the least profit which it made in any one year was $2,227,965, and its average annual profit has been nearly four millions ($3,800,000). Its profit last year, as shown by the appended table, was $7,660,350; and its total profit during the seventeen years has been over $65,000,000. Its least profit in the last five years was nearly five millions, and its average annual profit in that period was six and a quarter millions. If the profit of the postal telegraph were but a quarter of this latter amount, or $1,562,500, it would certainly meet the $120,000 of yearly interest and assure the annual redemption of $300,000 principal when due. That result is as absolutely sure as are the forty-odd millions of postal revenue from the sale of postage stamps; and there is not a capitalist in America who would not take these bonds, even were the Government not otherwise a guarantor, simply on the certainty of the business.

And, Mr. Chairman, this plan could not cost the tax-payer a single cent either in principal or interest. It could not cost the Government a fraction of a cent. It is simply a loan of the Government's credit to itself, through one of its own Departments, converted into its own telegraph lines, the interest to be paid and the loan to be repaid by the persons who shall send messages over those lines. That, and that alone, is the whole of it. Congress is not asked to make an appropriation. The party in power and responsible for legislation is not asked to swell the aggregate of expenditures. There is no waste, and can be none, of the people's money. And no tax-payer on the continent can be bled for the benefit of the men who send telegrams, while these men would pay lower rates for telegrams sent.

CHEAPER RATES TO THE PUBLIC.

Last year the patrons of the Western Union sent 40,581,177 messages, for which they paid to it $19,454,903. It reports its expenses as being $11,794,553 and its profits as being $7,660,350. In other words, it received for the average message 48 cents, handled it at an alleged expense of 29 cents, and made a profit of 19 cents, or a profit on its expense of 65 per cent. In 1882 and 1881 its receipt was 44 cents, its alleged expense was but 25 cents, and in 1880 but 23 cents, and its profit on its expense was over 75 per cent. With the cheaper rates that competition by a postal telegraph would assure, the telegraphing public would inevitably save many millions of dollars, even were the Western Union rates reduced one-half, or to a profit of 35 per cent.

Nor would such a cheapening of rates jeopardize the Government's profits, because the lower the rate the greater will be the volume of the whole business, of which Government would undoubtedly have its fair share. The reduction of letter postage, in which I am proud of having taken an earnest part, conclusively illustrates the fixed law of postal trade, that the cheaper the rate the greater the business and profits. The very principle upon which I then advocated cheap postage is the one on which to-day I base the certainty of Government's profit in postal telegraphy. And at the worst it could not possibly lose anything, because its lines, each year becoming more valuable, would be an acquired property of which it could dispose by sale at figures far above those of the cost should it so desire.

CHEAP TELEGRAPHY FOR THE WHOLE PEOPLE.

And for the same reasons that I advocated cheap postage for the whole people I now advocate cheap telegraphy for the whole people. They are as much entitled to the latter as they were to the former; indeed, they have a stronger claim—the claim of a free people to just protection against the rapacity of an imperial corporation, in the relentless clutch of which they find themselves powerless, if perchance Government itself shall not also be found equally powerless in the same grasp. And I plead to-day for such beneficent action by the sagacious Government of a great-hearted people as shall in some future day place at the disposal of the farmers, the mechanics, and all the industrial classes of America the swift lightning as their messenger, to flash along wires that shall lace and enmesh the whole continent, and to deliver their tidings at a cost of 10 or 5 or 3 cents; action that in due time shall give to the poorest American the very best facilities of modern science, which now are barred from him by high charges and open to the affluent alone; foreseeing-action that shall "cast up the highway of the people" to each American village and hamlet, along which in that coming day intelligence "shall run to and fro and knowledge shall be increased," so that a thronged American population shall be as free from ignorance of events as now they are free from kingly scepters.

SHALL WE BUILD NEW LINES?

If this mode of providing means be adjudged feasible, and to me it seems as safe and equitable as the Constitution itself, and if the issuance of bonds should commend itself to the judgment of Congress, then a long stride toward the goal of practicability will have been taken. If by simply loaning its credit to the Post-Office Department, the Government, without the outlay of a cent, can become possessed of property worth many times its cost, which will assure the payment of interest and the full repayment of the loan, then we may discuss the outlines of ways as a matter of practical rather than of abstract moment. And I shall be brief.

As to contracting for service with new or existing companies, it is clear that they would fairly require a profit on the capital invested and the work performed; and as clear that Government can obtain the capital more cheaply than can they, can hire men as cheaply, perform the work as well, and itself make and save the profit which they would rightfully expect. The Western Union pays 7 per cent. on its oceanic stock; Government can borrow at 2½ or 2 per cent. The former pays large rents and an "army of messengers;" existing post-offices would furnish room for telegraph instruments without much, if any, additional rent, and the present force of letter-carriers would do much of the delivery work. So that as a business proposition it will certainly be cheaper and better for Government to operate its own lines than to contract for service.

As to buying lines, first, any appraisement of existing lines, under the act of 1866, would place their value at not less than $65,000,000; and, second, we can build better ones for $5,000,000 to start with; and out of the earnings, within less than ten years, more than duplicate all existing lines.

PACIFIC RAILROAD LINES.

And in this connection I wish to call attention to the fact that every one of the land grants was made to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line; that from Duluth, Omaha, Kansas City, and Marshall, Tex., to the Pacific Ocean Congress has already built telegraphs; that an expressed condition of each of these grants was the consideration that the grantee would not only transact Government business over its wires but would give it precedence over all other business.

As a sample of the contract I quote section 6 of the Pacific Railroad act, July 1, 1862, and call attention to the italicized portions, which may be read together:

> That the grants aforesaid are made upon the condition that said company shall pay said bonds at maturity, and shall keep said railroad and telegraph line in repair and use, and shall at all times transmit dispatches over said telegraph line, and transport mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon said railroad for the Government whenever required to do so by any Department thereof, and that the Government shall at all times have the preference in the use of the same for all the purposes aforesaid at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, &c.

Why duplicate lines which you have already built, anyhow at the outset? Why not hold these railway companies both to the letter and the spirit of the law, and compel them to perform telegraphic as well as transportation service at the rates therein designated? They have at least in some cases and in the very teeth of the law, with the recklessness of pirates, attempted to sell these very lines to the Western Union. They possess no such legal power, and the Government can and should compel each of those corporations to keep its line in the same legal status as its rails, and both alike ready for Government business. And, for one, I can see neither rhyme nor reason in the idea of building additional lines through desert, mountain, or sparsely settled regions simply for the purpose of allowing these cormorants to gobble lines which we have already built, and which we to-day hold as part security for $106,000,000 which they do not intend to pay, and which, so far as my little power goes, I intend they shall pay or deliver up the whole property.

The telegraph act of 1866 contains a similar provision as to precedence of Government business and the fixing of compensation, in consideration of valuable privileges granted to the companies accepting its provisions. All existing telegraph companies have so accepted and are bound by the contract. And until the postal wires have reached all points where these companies have offices, they should be required to receive, transmit, and deliver postal telegrams on the conditions and rates specified.

EFFECTS OF A POSTAL TELEGRAPH.

To conclude, Mr. Chairman, I affirm the following propositions, and stand ready to prove them to the satisfaction of disinterested minds, if they be not already proven: That an issue of $6,000,000, the interest and principal of which would as certainly be paid by the earnings of a postal telegraph as that the Republic endures, will build and furnish lines within one year connecting all important towns in the United States between the Atlantic and the eastern termini of the Pacific roads and between Canada and the Gulf; that by enforcing existing laws and contracts with existing telegraph companies as to the transmission of Government business, postal telegrams would be received and delivered at all points where they have a telegraph office, and in addition by mail at any post-office of the United States; that after paying these companies reasonable rates for such service the Government would make a handsome profit, and by competition, yet without destroying existing lines, would save to their patrons millions of dollars annually which are now usuriously extorted by them; that, by the fac-simile process and within a few years after the establishment of a postal telegraph, the standard of a message will be a letter-sheet instead of as now ten words, and that the face characters of this telegraphic letter will be transmitted at the rate of twenty sheets per minute and at the cost of a nickel or perhaps a mill; that when this occurs the great bulk of commercial drafts, orders, and letters, and also of social correspondence, will be transmitted by wire and not in mail-bags; that before 1900 our railway and star mails will contain only confidential and domestic letters and be chiefly composed of printed matter; that unless Government operates a postal telegraph the real "letters" which we now regard as the substance and vitality of mail matter, and the handling of which the Constitution expressly reserves to the Government, will in this century practically be handled by the Western Union or other private corporations in defiance of the Constitution, and, in the words of Dr. Green, "who can say that sooner or later there would not be an espionage of telegrams instituted?" that the very reasons which justified the framers of the Constitution in reserving to Government "the communicating of intelligence among the people" to-day justify and imperatively demand the creation of a postal telegraph; that within ten years of its establishment two-thirds of the post-offices of the United States will receive the bulk of their letter-mail by wire; that before 1900 the maximum charge for a telegram of one hundred words will not exceed 10 cents; that as a consequence the weekly paper of that day will have more telegraphic news than any daily now has; that, as another consequence, the rapid and cheap dissemination of every description of intelligence among the people will assure a solidity and perpetuity to the American Republic such as history has not recorded of any nation; that, as another consequence, the farmer near a post-office will be as speedily advised as to the conditions in Europe, Asia, or Africa affecting the prices of American crops, which facts are now monopolized by the speculators who corner prices, as will any broker in New York or Liverpool; that, as a consequence, the wealth of America will be evenly and justly distributed, and the prosperity of the nation as real and lasting as the light of the sun; that these practical and beneficent results will logically and certainly flow from the establishment and full development of a postal telegraph, and that the operator of that day, who will usually be a girl, will not destroy the liberties of the people.

The Democratic party controls this House. It is responsible for legislation. It claims to be opposed to monopolies and to be the friend of the people. The worst and most dangerous monopoly in America to-day is the Western Union. A postal telegraph can be built without costing the Government or the tax-payer a cent. Will the Democratic majority in this House and at this session pass a postal telegraph bill, or will it not? If it does not, it will rightfully be held responsible by the people for such inaction, while the Western Union will be happy!

Mr. HUTCHINS took the floor and moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move that after the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumes consideration of the Navy appropriation bill all general debate shall be limited to one hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUTCHINS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMS FOR MILITIA, ETC.

Mr. RANDALL. There are on the Speaker's table two bills from the Senate relating to subjects which I think belong to nd are embraced in the sundry civil appropriation bill—one in reference to the Capitol terrace and the other to arms for the militia. I ask by unanimous consent they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and bills of the following title were taken from the Speaker's table, severally read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

A bill (S. 156) to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to purchase arms and equipments for the militia; and

A bill (S. 402) for the completion of the Capitol terrace and the stairways connected therewith.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the bill to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce, which has been reported to the House by the Committee on Commerce and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, be set for consideration on Tuesday, the 18th of March, 1884, in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and the consideration thereof be continued from day to day until finally acted upon; not to interfere with general appropriation or revenue bills.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES, ETC.

Mr. CONVERSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present for reference to the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, and to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, some resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio on the subject of pensions and the equalization of bounties.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The resolutions are as follows:

Joint resolution requesting Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for an increase of pensions in certain cases.

Whereas Federal soldiers and sailors of the late war who lost one eye in the service only receive a pension of $4 per month, which is unjust when compared with pensions allowed for other disabilities; and

Whereas a bill is now pending in the House of Representatives of the United States providing for the increase of such pensions from $4 to $18 per month: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and are hereby, requested to vote for such bill and said increase, and to use all honorable means to secure the passage thereof, and that the governor of Ohio be requested to forward copies of this resolution to the presiding officer of each House of Congress and to each of the Senators and Representatives from Ohio.

L. A. BRUNNER,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
ELMER WHITE,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Adopted February 21, 1884.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, OHIO,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, James W. Newman, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio on the 21st day of February, A. D. 1884, taken from the original rolls filed in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, the 22d day of February, A. D. 1884.

[SEAL.] JAMES W. NEWMAN,
Secretary of State.

Joint resolution requesting Senators and Representatives in Congress to urge the passage of a law for the equalization of bounties.

Whereas a great irregularity exists among the Union soldiers of the late war in the amount of bounties they received; and

Whereas the present condition of our revenues render it easy for our Government to do justice by its brave defenders: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this General Assembly that Congress should, at its earliest opportunity, pass a law equalizing the bounties of Union soldiers.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to furnish each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of these resolutions.

L. A. BRUNNER,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
ELMER WHITE,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Adopted February 21, 1884.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, OHIO,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, James W. Newman, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio on the 21st day of February, A. D. 1884, taken from the original rolls filed in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, the 22d day of February, A. D. 1884.

[SEAL.] JAMES W. NEWMAN,
Secretary of State.

THOMAS MULVIHILL.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar and put upon its passage the bill H. R. 4704. I will make a brief statement with reference to the matter, after which of course any gentleman can make objections.

This bill is simply to correct a mistake which was made by a conveyancer in including too much land in a conveyance of land made by Mr. Mulvihill to the United States Government——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. This debate is not to be understood as preventing objections?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for unanimous consent to the House.

The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4704) authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to reconvey to Thomas Mulvihill certain lands erroneously conveyed by him to the United States.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. It had better be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War, acting for and on behalf of the United States of America, be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to reconvey to Thomas Mulvihill, by deed of conveyance duly executed, all the right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to such part or portion of the lot of land as was erroneously conveyed to the United States of America by said Thomas Mulvihill by deed dated October 20, A. D. 1877, and as recommended in a message from the President of the United States to Congress bearing date the 13th day of December, A. D. 1883.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BUDD. I object. I would like to know if this has been reported upon by any committee?

Mr. HOPKINS. It is unanimously reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUDD. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. This is simply a question as to restoring to this man property unlawfully held from him.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. SLOCUM. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 2228) to remove certain burdens from the American merchant marine, and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, be made a special order for Thursday, March 13, after the morning hour, to continue from day to day until it is disposed of, not to interfere with regular appropriation or revenue bills and the consideration of reports from the Committee on the Public Lands or prior orders.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the right to object until I can ask the gentleman a question. Does that bill embrace any change in the pilotage laws?

Mr. SLOCUM. No, sir, it does not.

Mr. COX, of New York. That includes the consideration of amendments to the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. It does.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SLOCUM moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment to have a bill taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs—the bill for the additional cruisers?

Mr. NEECE. I desire to present a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done pending the motion to adjourn.

Mr. NEECE. I hope the gentleman will permit this report to be made.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I withdraw the motion to adjourn to allow the gentleman from New York to have a bill referred, as he suggests, and, with the understanding that it is privileged, to allow the gentleman from Illinois to submit the report he refers to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided whether the gentleman presents a privileged report or not.

Mr. NEECE. This is a report on a resolution referred to the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Enrolled Bills be instructed to inquire into and report the cause of the delay in forwarding to the President for his approval the joint resolution passed on the 11th instant, appropriating $300,000 for the relief of the sufferers from the floods in the Ohio River.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman who submitted that resolution is not now present.

Mr. NEECE. It will not be necessary for him to be present. I would like to have the report accompanying the resolution read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see that this is a privileged report. Permission was not given to the committee to report at any time.

Mr. NEECE. Then I ask unanimous consent to have the report read and considered now.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he does not think the gentleman who offered the proposition should be present before any action is taken upon it?

Mr. NEECE. He has approved of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that this is not a privileged report. The gentleman now asks unanimous consent for its consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the Senate bill (No. 698) to authorize the construction of additional steel vessels for the Navy be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I object.

Mr. COX, of New York. What for? It belongs to that committee.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Let it take its regular course.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 3, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

DISEASES OF SWINE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a report of the Secretary of State, accompanying a report made by the commission lately designated by me to examine and report upon the asserted unhealthfulness of the swine products of this country. The views and conclusions of the commission deserve the most careful consideration of Congress, to the end that if any path be legitimately open for removing the prohibition which closes important foreign markets to those products it may be followed and appropriate legislation devised.

I earnestly recommend that Congress provide for reimbursing the expenses incurred by the commissioners in this praiseworthy service, and I should be glad also if some remunerative recognition of their public-spirited action in accepting the onerous and responsible duties imposed on them were to suggest itself to Congress. At all events, in view of the conflicting theories touching the origin and propagation of trichiniasis, and the means of isolating and extirpating it among domestic swine, and considering the important bearing which precise knowledge on these points would have on the commercial aspects of the matter, I recommend provision for special research in this direction.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 29, 1884.

The papers above referred to are transmitted under the same date to the House of Representatives.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the act of Congress approved January 16, 1883, entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," the Civil Service Commission has made to the President its first annual report.

That report is herewith transmitted, together with communications from the heads of the several Executive Departments of the Government respecting the practical working of the law under which the commission has been acting.

Upon the good results which that law has already accomplished I congratulate Congress and the people, and I avow my conviction that it will henceforth prove to be of still more signal benefit to the public service.

I heartily commend the zeal and fidelity of the commissioners and their suggestion for further legislation, and I advise the making of such an appropriation as shall be adequate for their needs.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 29, 1884.

Mr. PLUMB. I present resolutions adopted at a convention of the Kansas Cane-Growers' Association, held at Topeka, Kans., February 15, 1884. I will venture to ask that the resolutions may be read at the desk. I will state that they are not formally addressed to Congress, but were sent to me and intended to be presented to the Senate, as will appear by the concluding resolution.

The resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it resolved, That we, the assembled cane-growers of Kansas, having, only after a few years' existence, produced this year, from 48,221 acres, 447,859 tons of cane, resulting in 4,684,000 gallons of sirup, valued at $2,088,000, do hereby most respectfully but most earnestly petition our representatives at Washington not to tamper with or suffer any further reduction of the tariff on sugar, nor to entertain any further propositions of reciprocity treaties that would have the effect of importing free foreign sugar. Two of our large factories have been able to produce sugar in large quantities this year, and unless this new industry be protected and fostered by the General Government it may be crushed in its infancy. We take the liberty to point to the best sugar industry of Europe, that has grown to immense proportions by the fostering care of respective governments, producing to-day 2,000,000 tons annually; that the encouragement offered by the French Government in appropriating large sums for experiments in producing sugar from the beet root has resulted in the firm establishment of one of the leading industries of that country, giving employment to millions of persons, and now returning to the government a revenue of over $2,000,000 per annum. We also point to the fact that there is no other industry which promises such a large benefit to our people; for, in case of its development, $100,000,000 will be distributed among them and our farmers which otherwise would be sent abroad for this one commodity to countries where slave labor is used. There is no other article on which import duty is levied by the tariff where the burden is levied so uniformly upon the entire people, not amounting to more than 75 cents per capita annually; and that the consumption of sugar in the United States is one-fourth of all the sugar known to commerce in the world; and that, with the continued increase of demand, in less than fifty years the demand will be greater than the present entire production known to commerce; and that, the area of land suitable for the cultivation of Southern cane being limited, it has become a necessity to develop new sources of supply. We also point to the fact that the ratification of the Hawaiian treaty did not bring about the expected reduction in the price of sugar, but that the people of the Pacific coast pay monopoly prices for their sugar, and no other result can be expected from any other treaty or any further tampering with the tariff, as the benefit would not accrue to the great masses of consumers, but to gigantic monopolizing corporations that would spring up.

Be it resolved, That this resolution be printed in the form of a communication, and sent to every representative in Washington, and the representatives of our own State are earnestly requested and urged to present the justice of our appeal to Congress, and advocate such measures as will lead to stability and permanence in fostering this great industry, to the benefit and advantage of our own people, and not to that of foreign people and countries.

F. W. GILES, Topeka, Chairman.
C. H. SWEETSTER, Boston, Mass.
E. H. S. BAILEY, Lawrence.
A. J. DECKER, Fond du Lac, Wis.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of citizens of Uniontown and vicinity, in the District of Columbia, praying that the name of "Uniontown" be changed to "Anacostia;" which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS. I present the petition of a very large number of the residents of the District of Columbia, engaged in every branch of business, productive and commercial, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 1060 and H. R. 3447) to regulate licenses in the District of Columbia. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. VEST. I present a memorial of the president and members of the legislative council of the Territory of New Mexico, calling the attention of Congress to the official conduct of the secretary of that Territory. As the Territory of New Mexico has no immediate representative in the Senate, I ask that the memorial be read, with a view to my offering a resolution in connection with the subject-matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reading of the memorial? The Chair hears none, and the memorial will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the memorial, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

The undersigned, members-elect of the twenty-sixth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, submit for your impartial consideration the following statement of facts and of the issues which have been raised between us and the secretary and governor of the Territory:

On the one hand, the secretary claims that under the laws of the United States and of the Territory he has the power to "organize" the respective houses of the Legislature. By this phrase, as appears by his action on the 18th instant, it is meant that the secretary can arbitrarily name the persons who are prima facie entitled to seats in each House.

On the other hand, we insist that under the laws of the United States and of the Territory each house is the judge of the election and qualifications of its own members, and that the secretary is simply a ministerial officer, to whom is confided the duty of administering the oath of office to the members and officers elect.

This issue is so plain and the law so explicit, that it would seem no candid man, lawyer or not, can be in doubt; and that you may have before you the entire law bearing upon the subject we subjoin the following extracts from the statutes of the United States and of this Territory:

Section 35 of the act of the Territorial assembly approved July 20, 1851 (Prince's Compilation, page 31), is as follows:

"Each branch of the Legislative Assembly shall decide and determine the election and qualifications of their own members under the rules and restrictions that may be respectively adopted by each branch for that purpose."

Section 1921 United States Revised Statutes, page 338, is as follows:

"The secretary of New Mexico Territory upon the convening of the Legislature thereof shall administer the oath of office to the members-elect of the two houses and the officers thereof when chosen; and no other person shall be competent to administer such oath save in the absence of the secretary; in which case any one member of either house may administer the oath to the presiding officer elect and he shall administer the same to the members and other officers."

The act of Congress approved February 14, authorizing the present session of this Legislative Assembly, provides:

"That the members-elect to the Legislative Assembly of New Mexico in November 1882, and all vacancies legally filled since that time, if any, are hereby declared to be the legal members of the Legislature hereby authorized, subject to all valid contests."

The act of the Legislative Assembly of July 20, 1851 (Prince's Laws, page 332 section 50), is as follows:

"If a contested election be pending, the person holding the certificate of election shall take possession and discharge the duties of the office until the contest shall be decided."

Paragraph 9 of section 14 of the act of the Legislative Assembly, approved February 13, 1876, provides that—

"The board of county commissioners shall act as boards of canvassers of the elections within their respective counties, and shall immediately issue a certificate of election under their hands to the person that may have received the highest number of votes for any office."—Prince's Laws of New Mexico, page 226, section 14, paragraph 9.

This being the law, on February 18, 1884, the two houses met at Santa Fé and the following occurrence took place:

At 11.30 a. m., in pursuance of the act of Congress authorizing the meeting, Hon. J. Francisco Chaves, of Valencia County, called to order the members-elect of the council assembled in council chambers, and a temporary organization was effected by the election of Hon. Anthony Joseph, of Taos County, as temporary chairman, and a committee on credentials was appointed, and all persons claiming seats in the council were requested to submit their certificates for examination and report to such committee.

The following members produced and handed to the committee certificates of election issued at the time fixed by law by the several boards of county commissioners in their respective districts in conformity with the statutes last above quoted, namely, J. Francisco Chaves, Valencia County; Anthony Joseph, Toas County; H. H. Whitehill, Grant, Doña Ana and Lincoln Counties; J. Inocencio Valdez, Colfax and Mora Counties; Francisco Perea, Bernalillo County; Charles Montaldo, Bernalillo County; H. L. Warren, Santa Fé County.

Other members who held certificates which are equally regular, namely, W. H. Kellar, San Miguel County; Andres Sena, San Miguel County; John Miller, Grant, Doña Ana, and Lincoln Counties; J. Armijo y Vigil, Socorro County; and José Pablo Gallegos, Rio Arriba County, did not appear in the council chamber nor produce their credentials, nor did T. B. Catron, of Santa Fé County, who it is understood holds a certificate of election issued by the board of commissioners of that county subsequent to that issued to H. L. Warren in obedience to an order made by the judge of the first judicial district court, appear or produce any certificate.

No person other than those named had or has any certificate of election to this council, which is composed by law of twelve members. The committee having made a report in accordance with the credentials exhibited, and it appearing that seven members, constituting a majority, were present, a permanent organization was completed by the election of Hon. J. Francisco Chaves, of Valencia County, as president, and other officers, after which W. G. Ritch, secretary of the Territory, was requested by vote to administer the oath of office to the members and officers of the council.

At this juncture Secretary Ritch, accompanied by several persons, entered the council chamber and proceeded to the desk where President Chaves was seated, who courteously arose to receive them.

The secretary seized the president's gavel and announced that he was present to organize the council, and requested Colonel Chaves to vacate the platform upon which he stood, and also stated that all persons not members must leave the room. Colonel Chaves and a number of members requested the secretary to perform his duties and administer the oath, which he violently refused to do, and stated that unless permitted to organize the council he would call upon the governor and have the members present expelled from the chamber by the militia.

This extraordinary scene terminated by the withdrawal of the secretary and his followers, when the oath of office was duly administered by Hon. Anthony Joseph to the president, who in turn swore in the other members, making seven, whose names are given above.

The secretary upon leaving the council chamber proceeded to the house of representatives, accompanied by a faction of the members thereof, where he immediately took the speaker's stand and announced that he was there for the purpose of organizing the house of representatives; that as the seats of the members from Bernalillo County were contested, he would not administer the oath of office to them, but would leave the house to determine who had the prima facie right to those seats. Against the protest of several of the members present he refused to administer the oath of office to W. B. Childers, Leó J. Barr, Jesus Sena y Garcia, who, as it appears from the returns in said secretary's office, and by the certificates of election which they hold, received a majority over their respective contestants. The said majorities by the returns in said secretary's office are as follows: W. B. Childers over Rafael Chaves 1,074 votes; Leo J. Barr over M. C. de Baca 1,068: Jesus Sena y Garcia over Whiteman 750 votes.

The secretary then proceeded to administer the oath of office to the members from other counties, including Librado Valencia, of Santa Fé County, a certificate to whose seat, regularly issued by the county commissioners of said county, is held by N. B. Laughlin. A certificate held by the said Valencia was issued by the commissioners of Santa Fé County under judicial dictation and under protest, and this too when there was no application in the name of the said Valencia pending before the judge who usurped the authority to compel the issue of the same.

The secretary then announced that he would entertain a motion without debate to determine which claimants to the seats of members from Bernalillo County should be sworn in.

A motion was then made by one of the factions that came into the hall with the said secretary to seat the minority claimants and contestants from the county of Bernalillo, W. H. Whiteman, M. C. de Baca, and Rafael Chaves having the majorities against them above given. The secretary refused to entertain motions in amendment or as substitutes or to permit any debate on said motion, and also refused to give the members required to vote thereon any information on the question raised by said motion. Opposition to this unlawful proceeding could not be successfully made without a breach of the peace.

A call of the roll of the members already sworn in resulted in 9 votes in the affirmative and 4 in the negative. Seven members whose names were called refused to recognize the legality of this proceeding by not voting at all. The minority candidates then came forward, and were sworn in by the secretary in defiance of law.

Thus the secretary unlawfully caused these contestants to be seated before the organization of the House for the purpose of giving control thereof to an opposing faction.

The secretary then continued to usurp the place of a temporary chairman in the same despotic manner until the speaker had been elected by the members to whom he had thus arbitrarily administered the oath of office.

After leaving the house the secretary proceeded to some other place, and, without officially advising the council so organized as aforesaid, there administered the oath not only to the five persons above mentioned holding certificates, but to two other persons, to wit, C. C. McComas and J. M. Montoya, of Bernalillo, who held no certificates of election or credentials whatever, but with reference to whom the official returns in his office showed they had been defeated by a majority of nearly 1,000 votes, they having no certificates of election whatever. He also administered the oath to T. B. Catron, of Sante Fé County, notwithstanding the board of canvassers of said county, at the time, place, and in the manner prescribed by law, had issued to H. L. Warren their certificate certifying his election to that office.

Whereupon, in furtherance of their preconcerted and fraudulent scheme, the governor and secretary recognized the body thus organized as the council of New Mexico.

The truth thus appearing as follows: Seven members holding the proper and legal evidences of election (constituting a quorum and legal majority of the council) are wholly ignored, and five members acting with those above named, being the three who held no legal or other evidence of an election whatever, are wrongfully recognized and treated as a legal body.

All this was arbitrarily and unlawfully done in defiance of right and justice and the plain provisions of the law for the purpose of giving a faction the control of the Legislative Assembly.

The pretext for this outrage was that the district court had adjudicated the facts applicable to these contests in the cases of county officers, which was not true either in point of law or fact, as the claimants to those seats in the house and council were not parties to any contest before the district court; neither had said court ever pretended to examine into or pass upon the facts involved in their cases, and had no power to do so.

We submit that nothing has occurred to justify this usurpation and outrage upon law and good government. Contests for seats in legislative bodies can only be investigated fairly and legally by these bodies themselves after they have been organized.

The Secretary of the Territory, aided and abetted by the governor, if these outrages go unrebuked, can turn future Legislative Assemblies over to the control of a minority faction at pleasure, and elections by the people will become a farce.

Remote from the seat of Government at Washington, acts of usurpation are resorted to by Federal appointees with the hope and expectation that delay in securing a hearing for redress will silence complaint until occasion requires a fresh outbreak.

Thus from year to year the people of New Mexico have been the victims of such acts of usurpation and outrage as your memorialists have above set forth.

Your memorialists therefore appeal with confidence to the Congress of the United States to promptly investigate these charges and see that our rights under the Constitution and the laws of the United States and of the Territory of New Mexico are recognized and vindicated. And thus your memorialists will ever pray.

Attest:

Mr. VEST. I ask unanimous consent to offer at this time a resolution in regard to the subject of the memorial, which I think will give rise to no debate, sending the matter to the Committee on Territories of the Senate for examination.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas a memorial has been presented to the Congress of the United States, signed by J. Francesco Chaves, president, and H. H. Whitehill, Charles Montaldo, Francesco Perea, J. Inocencio Valdez, Anthony Joseph, and Henry L. Warren, members of the legislative council of the Territory of New Mexico, in which memorial it is alleged that W. G. Ritch, secretary of said Territory, has unlawfully and arbitrarily usurped the right to organize the two houses of said Legislature and to pass upon the right of persons to seats therein and in pursuance of such claim has administered the oath of office to certain persons as members of said Legislature who were not legally elected thereto and had no certificates of election, to the exclusion of persons legally elected and holding certificates thereof: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to inquire as to the allegations made in the memorial, and what legislation is necessary, if any, in regard to the action of the secretary of said Territory of New Mexico; and the committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and report by bill or otherwise.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Territories.

THE CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY.

Mr. VOORHEES. On the 10th of December last I reported from the proper committee the bill (S. 572) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library. After that a substitute was presented from the committee which received the favorable consideration of the Senate and has been passed. I therefore move that the bill which was reported on the 10th of December, which I find still upon the Calendar, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD INDEX.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. R. 59) to limit the cost of indexing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the joint resolution be reported for information.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Joint Committee on Printing be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to make the necessary provisions and arrangements for issuing the index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semi-monthly during the sessions of Congress; that the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to print and distribute the same number of copies of said semi-monthly index as he prints and distributes of the daily issue of the RECORD, and to the same persons and in the same manner; that the Public Printer shall employ such person to prepare said index as shall be designated by the Joint Committee on Printing, who shall also fix and regulate the compensation to be paid by the Public Printer for the said work, and direct the form and manner of its publication: Provided, however, That the rate of compensation allowed for preparing the said semi-monthly indexes, including their compilation into a complete session index, shall not exceed, for each page of the printed CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the average that it cost per page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for compiling the session index of the Forty-sixth Congress: And provided further, That there may be employed and paid on said work, at times not interfering with their ordinary employment, persons who are also employed and paid in any other office or employment under the Government.

SEC. 2. That the joint resolution approved February 8, 1881, entitled "Joint resolution to provide for printing and distributing the index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semi-monthly," is hereby repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution?

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless some Senator desires it, it will be taken that the reading already had is a reading as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will make a very brief explanation. The body of the joint resolution is the same as that referred to in the second section, a joint resolution that was approved in 1881, under which the work has been going on. The Comptroller of the Treasury makes a technical point against a part of the compensation paid for getting up the index, and we amend the joint resolution of 1881, repealing that and re-enacting it with certain amendments.

The point in the matter is this: We have succeeded in getting a gentleman of exceptional qualifications for the work of indexing, and he has been enabled to do it with very great economy and to the great satisfaction of those who have occasion to use the index. He has done it, however, by employing evenings certain persons in the Departments who like himself have the rare faculty of making a good index and paying them an extra compensation for their evening work, for he wants them only a short time every month, an evening or two perhaps, a dozen evenings or more in the course of the year. The Comptroller or some proper officer in his office has raised the point that these clerks were receiving double compensation from the Government, which is contrary to existing law. We save a good many thousand dollars by allowing the gentleman who has the work in charge to hire certain peculiarly adapted persons for certain evenings in the course of the year. That is the object of the joint resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. Who does the work and how much does it cost?

Mr. HAWLEY. The precise cost I can not give just now, but the cost of it is many thousands of dollars less than it was under the old system, and we not only get the index for the whole session, the usual old-fashioned index for the session, but the semi-monthly index.

Mr. INGALLS. This semi-monthly index composes the final index in gross of the entire RECORD?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is all worked over into the final index.

Mr. INGALLS. Did the Senator state the name of the individual who made the index?

Mr. HAWLEY. General Albert Ordway, of Massachusetts.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me to make another suggestion, and that is, that the frame of this measure should be changed from a joint resolution to a bill? I am unable to understand how this confusion should exist in our files, and one measure be called a joint resolution and another a bill, when both require precisely the same parliamentary treatment. They both require to be read three times and the final assent of the President. I would suggest that to secure uniformity the structure of this measure be changed from a joint resolution to a bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the Senator is quite right; but in framing it we followed the original joint resolution. I will consent to change it to the form of a bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the criticism of the Senator from Kansas is eminently just. When we revised the statutes, we provided by rule or act that there should be no more joint resolutions but all bills, and for a while the rule was observed; but afterward it fell into disuse and we went back to joint resolutions. There is no distinction between a joint resolution and a bill except in name, and they should be the same in name.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest then that the Chief Clerk make the change.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to amend the enacting clause of the joint resolution so as turn it into a bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, as it now is, is still open to amendment. If no amendment be proposed the question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title, if there be no objection, will be corrected to conform to the enacting clause, making it a bill (S. 1692) to limit the cost of indexing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that House bill No. 4704 be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 4704) authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to reconvey to Thomas Mulvihill certain lands erroneously conveyed by him to the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT AUGUSTA, ME.

Mr. VOORHEES. My object in rising at this time is to state that there are several bills on the Calendar reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for the erection of public buildings in various States, and as there is no special order this morning I thought it might be convenient and agreeable to the Senate to take them up and dispose of them. They will not lead to any debate. The first is Order of Business 144, and if it be the pleasure of the Senate I should be very glad to have them taken up and disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 144, a bill (S. 235) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Augusta, Me.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I had supposed that the "exclusive jurisdiction" clause had been omitted of late years from these bills. I tried to show to the Senate on several occasions that that clause was calculated to involve the localities and the States where buildings were erected in confusion. In my judgment there is no necessity for it, because that clause, if carried out, would give the United States exclusive jurisdiction of every kind, the trial of all offenses committed in a post-office in every city or town in the Union. I have drawn the attention of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to this matter repeatedly, and I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] concurred with me at one time in regard to the propriety of leaving out that clause.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Indiana that here are three of these bills in a row; the Senator who reported them is absent, and both Senators from each of the States where the buildings are to be erected are absent. I suggest that he postpone his motion to take them up to some other time. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Senator who reported all these bills is absent, and the Senators from the States where the buildings are to be erected, in the first three instances, are absent.

Mr. VOORHEES. In regard to the bill now under consideration I have consulted with the Senators from Maine. My object, I will state frankly to the Senate, was to get up this class of bills and pass them at some time that is convenient for the Senate to do so, when there is no other business pressing. I know the Senators from Maine desire this bill passed, and if then it is objected to taking up the other bills which have been reported by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I shall not urge their consideration now.

Mr. HOAR. I did not object. I only called attention to the fact that everybody interested in these bills seemed to be absent. But I see the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has come in.

Mr. MORRILL. This is a copy of the same bill that passed the Senate last year.

Mr. FRYE. Is this the bill affecting the Augusta post-office building?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. There is no reason that I know of against it, and every reason for it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. May I be permitted to state to the Senator that I did not offer any objection to the bill; but I desired to draw attention to a clause of the bill which I think may involve some difficulty, the jurisdictional clause. We found in former years there was no necessity for it. It requires the cession of exclusive jurisdiction on the part of the State over the site set apart for the building, which, according to the decisions of the courts of the United States, carries with it jurisdiction over every description of offense which may be committed on that piece of ground. If the Senator wants a bill of that kind, I have no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator will see that the bill does not carry exclusive jurisdiction for every offense, and I will say that with entire respect for the opinions of the Senator from Florida, the committee have felt bound to follow the precedents which have been established ever since the foundation of the Government.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I think it is time to deliberately consider whether it would not be well for the Government to abandon the practice of erecting these costly and extravagant structures of granite and marble, and build less ostentatious and less pretentious fabrics of brick or other incombustible material in every place where the Government is a tenant.

We spend annually in architecture, in costly and extravagant decorations, in piles of marble and granite constructed at an immense cost and adorned with oriental hangings, with hammered brass and plate glass, enough to furnish simple and unpretentious structures for one-half the towns in this land where the Government is obliged to hire buildings for the accommodation of its offices. I wish that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would take into consideration the propriety of adopting some policy by which the Government shall build in every city and in every town where it is obliged to hire buildings for its use the necessary structures, as a business man would construct them, of brick and iron, without this vast and costly expenditure, which is of no advantage except to please the eye or gratify the taste.

Of course, I suppose that so long as there is a large surplus in the Treasury that must be expended somehow it will be useless to attempt to call a halt in this matter of expenditure; but I enter my protest against it as unrepublican, as superfluous and unjust.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I understand that this bill appropriates $150,000. I contend that it is not extravagant. Augusta is the capital of Maine. The mail business done in that city last year amounted to $652,184. In second-class mail matter it ranks the seventh in the United States. There are only six cities in the whole United States that in second-class matter exceed the Augusta post-office. In addition to that there is a pension office. Besides, the internal-revenue department has its office located there. In addition to that the United States court is to hold one session there a year. Now, under all the circumstances, with the vast amount of business done there by the United States, it seems to me that $150,000 is very reasonable indeed.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, to denounce an extravagant use of public money in the construction of public buildings is one thing; to denounce the system under which the Government is operating in regard to public buildings is another. For one, sir, as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I think that we have invariably attempted to reduce appropriations as much as possible, and in nearly every bill that has been reported we have cut off from one-fifth to one-fourth from the amount asked for in the bill.

There are no appropriations being made now by the Government for vast and costly structures of marble and granite of which the Senator from Kansas speaks. The appropriations now are $50,000, and $75,000, and $100,000, and no public building for a court-house, for internal-revenue purposes, and for other Government purposes, can be built worthy of this Government and sufficient for the needs of the public business for a less amount.

More than that, Mr. President, if we put this upon the basis of business alone, if the Senator from Kansas will look at the amount appropriated last year and for the last five fiscal years he will see that the rent actually paid by the Government in leasing private property for public purposes far exceeds 4 per cent. upon the amount of the expenditures in erecting these buildings by the Government. In other words, it is an actual saving of the public money to erect buildings of which the title shall be in the Government itself, instead of paying enormous rents, as is the case now all over the country, for buildings deficient in structure and not adapted to the public necessity at all.

But, Mr. President, more than that, there is a higher consideration than this. I say that the Government of the United States, with fifty million people, can afford to put up its own public buildings. They are a bond of indissoluble union between the people of the States; and when in every city where there is a necessity for a public building in the various portions of the country there is one, it is a reminder to the people that there is a Government to which we all belong and in which we are all interested. Sir, I favor the expenditure of this money, and I say it can not be better expended than for this public purpose.

As to the system on which it has been expended, I desire to say that there is a bill now pending, to which I ask the attention of the Senator from Kansas, which seeks to do away with the enormous abuses which have grown up under the system under which public buildings have been constructed in the past. We propose now, if we can do so, to put up these buildings by contract to the lowest bidder. If that bill can be passed it will save millions of dollars to the Government annually, and at the same time will remove scandals which are a disgrace to the public service.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I expressly said I was not opposed to the system, but to the methods. I believe that the system should be more widely diffused. I think that the Government never ought to be a tenant; it should never hire a structure. If accommodations are needed for a post-office, or for any other of the functions which the Government is called upon to exercise, it ought to own the building necessary for the shelter of its officers. But it has been the method that has prevailed of requiring these buildings to be constructed at an enormously large expense above the requirements for public architecture that has confined them to few localities. I favor a system that would permit the same amount of money that is now spent in these structures, far beyond what ought to be expended, to be so applied as to enable towns that are now deprived of these facilities to have them; and I believe that if the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would devote themselves to the development of a system that would require simple, inexpensive structures to be erected wherever the Government is now compelled to hire them, they would be doing a great public service.

I agree with the Senator from Missouri that there should exist in all portions of this Republic visible reminders of the power and grandeur of the nation; that there would be a stronger feeling of allegiance if everywhere the people were reminded by some visible object recalling the strength and power of the Government and of the flag to which they owed their allegiance.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I would say to the Senator from Kansas that the thirty or forty bills that may be presented at this session for public buildings in various parts of the country will not, all of them together, cost as much as one of the buildings that we have put up at Saint Louis, Chicago, New York, or other places. The committee reported one this morning, or authorized the report of one, for Kansas where $100,000 was asked, and it was cut down by the committee to $75,000 for the building and the site. I do not believe the Senator from Kansas will think that too much for the place where that building is to be erected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CARSON CITY.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move now to take up the Order of Business No. 148, being the bill (S. 52) providing for the erection of a public building at Waco, Tex.

Mr. INGALLS. Why not take up the bills in their order on the Calendar?

Mr. VOORHEES. I am somewhat embarrassed by the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is not here, and I do not see either one of the Senators from Nevada or New Jersey in his seat; otherwise I would move to take up the two bills for those States.

Mr. INGALLS. I suppose they would not object to their being passed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I suppose not; and on the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas I would be very willing to do that. I change my motion and move to take up Order of Business No. 145.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana changes his motion, and moves now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 145, being Senate bill No. 55.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 55) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices in the city of Carson City, in the State of Nevada.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CAMDEN, N. J.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move now to take up Order of Business No 146, being Senate bill No. 160.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 160) for the erection of a public building at Camden, N. J.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROVIDENCE CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. VOORHEES. I make a similar motion in regard to Order of Business No. 147, being Senate bill No. 182.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 182) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase land adjacent to the custom-house in the city of Providence, R. I., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Indiana that in the twenty-fifth line, on page 2, the bill reads "until a valid title to such ground or site is vested 'it' the United States." It should be "in." That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is a clerical error.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WACO, TEX.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 148, being Senate bill 52.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 52) providing for the erection of a public building at Waco, Tex., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I just want to say a word in reply to the Senator from Vermont. It may be regarded as an unimportant thing, but this clause which requires every State to surrender its jurisdiction over every site for a public building before the Government will consent to erect one is not sanctioned by any long line of precedents under this Government, and it is violative, I think, of the spirit of the Constitution and of reason itself. We know that wherever a public building is erected for Government purposes without any cession whatever on the part of the State there is implied authority resting with the Government to use that building for the purpose for which it was erected, for a court, for a custom-house, or for a post-office; and this surrender of jurisdiction, as has been held a hundred times, means that the State shall give up its authority over that land; and if a pickpocket should pick the pocket of a citizen within that jurisdiction there will be no authority in the local courts to try him; if a murder was committed there there would be no authority to try the murderer. That has been the settled rule of law on that subject. It is exclusive jurisdiction, and that means exclusive power to try all offenses.

I have on former occasions pointed out that it is entirely unnecessary to put that in. I merely mention it. I do not make any objection to those Senators who want to have it in their bills having it.

Mr. COKE. I have heard the Senator from Florida make this same objection on sundry occasions, but so far as this bill is concerned I am entirely content, knowing that it is in the line of precedents for public buildings all over the United States. I do not see why this should be put in a different form from other bills for buildings that have been provided for.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I differ with the Senator about that. When I was chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I refused to report any bill with that clause in it.

Mr. COKE. I have been in the Senate seven years, and this clause has been uniformly inserted in all the bills.

Mr. McMILLAN. I find in the bills in which I am interested—and I suppose a similar exception is contained in all the other bills—an exception of this character. It is as follows as to the jurisdiction of the United States over the buildings and the grounds on which public buildings of the United States are erected:

> And that no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Minnesota shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein.

It seems to me that meets all the objections urged by the Senator from Florida.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GREENVILLE, S. C.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 149, being Senate bill 146.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 146) making appropriation for the erection of a public building at Greenville, S. C., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. Is that the next public-building bill in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Secretary informs the Chair that it is the next bill in order.

Mr. CONGER. The next of the public-buildings bills in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Secretary reports.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise procure a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Greenville, in the State of South Carolina, a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use of the United States district and circuit courts, post-office, internal-revenue office, and for other Government uses; the plans and estimates for said building to be prepared, examined, and approved as required by section 3734 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and at a cost which shall not exceed the sum of $50,000 when finally completed: Provided, That no money to be appropriated for said building shall be used until a valid title to the site selected, which site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least fifty feet, including streets and alleys, shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of South Carolina shall have ceded jurisdiction over the same for all purposes, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, except for the enforcement of the criminal laws of the State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to the only power in the Constitution on this subject of jurisdiction. The seventeenth clause of section 8 of Article I is as follows:

The Congress shall have power * * * to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district—

That is, the district ceded for a seat of Government—

(not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings.

There is no description of jurisdicti on that can be ceded but exclusive, and this reservation with respect to civil process and the execution of the criminal laws of the State, I will say to those Senators who have not thoroughly investigated it, has been held to amount to nothing. I had a test case that involved the life of a man where my State had ceded its jurisdiction just in the language of this bill over a piece of territory reserved for a navy-yard under this clause of the Constitution, and we had the most angry controversy in my State that had been there for twenty years between the courts, the State court claiming it under the act of cession, and the Federal court claiming the right to try it under the Constitution. The Federal tribunal finally succeeded and asserted the power of the Federal Government under that cession to try the man, and they exhibited the highest power that could be exhibited under a government, they executed the man under this clause of the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary calls the attention of the Chair to the fact that the title should be amended. If there be no objection the Secretary will change the title, as reported by the committee, so as to read "A bill for a public building at Greenville, S. C."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT KEY WEST.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 150, being the bill (S. 229) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to erect a public building in the city of Key West, Fla., to which I suppose the Senator from Florida will have no objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported the bill with an amendment to add the following proviso:

Provided, That no money appropriated for said building and land shall be available until a valid title to the site selected is vested in the United States, nor until the State of Florida shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know why the committee propose to strike out the preamble here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That question will come up after the bill has been passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to know whether this is to be a building in addition to the public building already there; if Key West is to be honored with two public buildings? It is a very material question.

Mr. VOORHEES. Oh, no; that is not it.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] says there is no public building there. His distinguished colleague [Mr. JONES, of Florida] introduced a bill which recites that there is a public building there and that it is not sufficiently large for the public purposes. Now if there are to be two, I should like to know why.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe the fact is that some buildings there are rented by the United States Government.

Mr. CALL. There is no adequate public building there, nothing that can be called a public building sufficient for any purpose.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I want to say that while this bill was introduced by myself, the amendment with respect to jurisdiction was put on by the committee without my consent, and I shall never in my place in the Senate subscribe to this principle, because I have concluded after the most mature deliberation that it is entirely unnecessary and is likely to lead at some future time to great complications between the States and the General Government with respect to this question of jurisdiction. There is but one description of jurisdiction that a State can cede to the General Government over a navy-yard or a lot for a public building or over an area of territory to be used for governmental purposes; and that is exclusive jurisdiction. I do not care what reservation the State may put in, if jurisdiction is ceded, as was held in the case in my State, it is constitutional jurisdiction, and carries with it all the incidents of a jurisdiction like that in the District of Columbia. It may be a very small thing at first view, but it might bring in a given case the sovereignties of the country together in conflict.

Then it is entirely unnecessary, because I say that when the Government of the United States buys a piece of ground in any State for the erection of a public building it can use that building for any Government use or for any purpose for which it may be wanted. It can use it for a court, for a post-office, or a custom-house, and this cession of jurisdiction in these bills is entirely a work of supererogation and entirely unnecessary.

I say this now; I have said it time and again on the floor of the Senate and I shall repeat it, although I am not going to antagonize the policy which has been indicated by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator want us to oppose the bill on that ground?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Oh, no; I do not.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a preamble to the bill which the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds report to strike out. The question is on the amendment of the committee striking out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

I would ask that the Senate proceed to their consideration also at this time. We have the time to do it, and it is as well perhaps to dispose of them. By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEBRASKA CITY.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 396.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 396) for the erection of a public building at Nebraska City, Nebr.

And the said sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, &c.

Mr. VOORHEES. As a matter of course that should be changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that it should read, "and the said sum of $75,000 is hereby appropriated."

Mr. VOORHEES. Undoubtedly. I ask that that amendment be made.

Mr. MORRILL. That will be right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made by unanimous consent, if there be no objection. It is made.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. MORRILL. I notice that the bill does not contain the usual provision in relation to jurisdiction over the building, and I ask to have it inserted there, as it has been in the other bills that have already passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It contains a relinquishment of the right to tax, which many of the preceding bills do not, but it does not contain any limitation of the jurisdiction in respect of process.

Mr. MORRILL. That is what I wish to put in. So far as the right to tax is concerned, I believe by general law that is already regulated and is not necessary to be in, but I move to add the usual exception so far as civil and criminal process is concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill:

For all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT PROVIDENCE.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask unanimous consent to recall the bill (S. 182) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase land adjacent to the custom-house in the city of Providence, R. I., in order to insert the same amendment in relation to the jurisdiction of courts that was inserted in the last bill. By accident that has been omitted, and the Senators from Rhode Island desire to have it inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him, which has already been passed by the Senate, be amended by inserting therein the following:

Shall be or remain the owners thereof for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein.

Is there objection to the correction of the bill already passed in the manner proposed by the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears no objection. The bill will be engrossed accordingly.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT SCOTT, KANS.

Mr. VOORHEES. There is but one more bill of this character. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 292.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 292) for the erection of a public building at Fort Scott, Kans.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIN BILL.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves to pass over all the preceding cases on the Calendar and to take up the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE HASKELL.

Mr. JOHN B. CLARK, jr., the Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared at the bar of the Senate and said: Mr. President, the House of Representatives has passed a series of resolutions as an appropriate tribute to the memory of DUDLEY C. HASKELL, late a Representative from the State of Kansas; which I am directed to communicate to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, as is usual in such cases, asks unanimous consent to lay before the Senate the resolutions from the House of Representatives. If there be no objection the resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the ordinary business of the House be laid aside in order that appropriate tribute may be paid to the memory of DUDLEY C. HASKELL, late a Representative from the State of Kansas.

Resolved, That in the untimely death of Mr. HASKELL the House has lost a conspicuous and faithful member, his constituents a zealous and capable servant, and the country a citizen of exemplary life, patriotic devotion, and rare promise.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect for his memory and sorrow for his loss, the House, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, shall adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. DUDLEY C. HASKELL, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Kansas.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for fitting tributes to the memory of the deceased and to his eminent public and private virtues, and that as a further mark of respect the Senate, at the conclusion of such remarks, shall adjourn.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, DUDLEY CHASE HASKELL was lineally and by nature a Puritan. Had he lived in that splendid epoch of English history when the race to which we belong reached its meridian, when genius culminated in Shakespeare, reason in Bacon, heroism in Raleigh, courtesy in Sidney, love of liberty in Hampden, military and civic leadership in Oliver Cromwell, he would, like his ancestors, have exiled himself from home, friends, possessions, crossed the implacable seas, and laid in the savage solitudes of an empty continent the foundations of a Christian commonwealth, "for the common good, for the protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness of the people, and not for the profit, honor, or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men;" a state builded upon the Bible as its chief corner-stone, and having for the charter of its liberties the golden rule.

No political experiment ever appeared less formidable at the outset than the colonization of Massachusetts Bay, but none ever had such momentous, such far-reaching consequences. The ideas of those fugitives from intolerance and proscription possessed inconceivable energy. The mind of man, released from the bondage of caste and precedent, conscious at last of its powers, has achieved results in letters, in science, in war, in government, which are not less a revelation than a prophecy.

The feeble colonists lingered for a while by the coast, wresting scanty subsistence from the sterile soil and the stormy sea; but moving slowly westward, the great column in two centuries has crossed the continent, overcoming all obstacles, conquering all adversaries, till at last, among fifty million people under self-government, freedom is universal, civil and political equality is the fundamental law, the safety of life, the preservation of liberty, the protection of property are effectually guaranteed, the means of education are diffused as widely as the desire to know, and the opportunities for happiness are commensurate with the capacity to enjoy.

None of the traits and attributes, physical, intellectual, or moral, which distinguished the original emigrants to New England were wanting in Mr. HASKELL, and in his relations to the politics and society of his State and the nation he exhibited the same qualities which characterized his progenitors two hundred and fifty years ago. Could he have assumed the garb and vestment of that ancient time, his great stature, the sedate dignity of his demeanor, his stately presence, an aspect of authority, and the serious gravity of his features would have rendered him the striking semblance of a worshipful magistrate of the colonial period.

To applause or censure for its own sake he was stoically indifferent. There was no insensibility to fame or blame in his nature, but he preferred the approval of his conscience to the approbation of mankind. He adhered strenuously to unpopular friends to his own detriment rather than incur suspicion of personal disloyalty. He advocated unpopular doctrines which commanded the assent of his reason or his conscience rather than gain votes by silence or duplicity. Conscience, which is said to make cowards of us all, made no coward of him; it made him courageous rather, and daringly aggressive and defiant intellectually in his support of principles which he considered essential to the well-being of the people. He believed in the appeal of truth to time, and aspired to be a real leader of opinion rather than to obtain the cheap and casual applause which rewards the demagogue, the impostor, and the charlatan.

Politics and religion are popularly supposed to be incompatible. So many assertions must be denied, so many purposes must be concealed, so many calumnies must be refuted, so many temptations must be resisted, that the most rigid and censorious moralists are disposed to mitigate the severity of judgment; but no such forbearance was required for HASKELL. He did not deny his Master. He bore his religion with him in every presence, in all contests. He was from earliest youth devout, reverent, chaste, pure in spirit, active in all work for the elevation of society. Everywhere and in all directions his influence was beneficent and ennobling. The world was better for his having lived, and his death was a subtraction from the moral forces which uphold and sustain mankind.

He came to Washington to take his seat as a Representative in the Forty-fifth Congress at the special session in October, 1877. He was immediately attacked by a disease from which few recover and which his physicians considered mortal. My apprehensions increased as he rapidly declined from day to day, till I was summoned to his bedside one morning at daylight, and found that he had sunk into unconsciousness, from which he could not be roused. Before noon he rallied sufficiently to converse, and was told by the physicians that if his affairs required attention he had better arrange them before evening, as he might sink into sleep from which he would not wake. He recognized the gravity of the situation and asked if there was no hope. They thought there was none, but told him he had a chance for life. He replied: "I will take that chance. Do your duty and I will do mine." The struggle was long and doubtful, but skill and courage triumphed for a time over his malady, though he never seemed to me to be wholly restored to his pristine strength and vigor. He blanched rapidly and looked pallid and haggard at times, as though his vital forces were well-nigh spent. But I mention the incident to show the metal of which the man was made. He sometimes spoke of that awful hour, of the solemnity with which he contemplated the dark abyss, and of the consolation afforded by faith and hope. And yet his great work was done in the succeeding six years, after he had almost risen from the dead.

He entered public life without professional training or special discipline. But he had indomitable perseverance, energy, determination to excel, and gradually toiled upward, amid many discouragements, till at the close of the Forty-seventh Congress he had fairly won his place in the front rank of thought and debate, especially upon economic questions, and could reasonably anticipate a broad career of increasing influence and national renown.

His oratory was energetic and forcible, but without decoration. He indulged in none of the ornaments of discourse, quotation, anecdote, wit, humor, fancy, badinage, or repartee. His weapon was the broadsword, not the rapier. He dealt in facts, in figures, in statistics, in arguments and deductions. He was a diligent, patient student, with that higher gift than genius, the capacity for assiduous and persistent labor, without which the most brilliant powers, after brief and fitful corruscation, uselessly expire. He did nothing at random. There was no diffusion in his career. He was not distracted by pleasure, passion, sense, or appetite from the path of duty. He traveled steadily along the beaten and dusty highway without loitering, and so came at last to his journey's end.

That a life so pure, so valuable, so exemplary, rich in noble achievements, but far richer in every prophecy of approaching distinction, should be thus abbreviated adds one more to the inscrutable mysteries that perplex us here. He fell in the vestibule, and not at the goal. For his wife, children, and kindred, inconsolable in their bereavement, for the friends who loved him, for the great constituency that laments him, for the State that he honored, for the nation that he served, he "should have died hereafter."

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, there are many reasons why I may be pardoned for adding a few words to the abundant and fitting eulogy already paid to the rare qualities and great worth of Mr. HASKELL. He was of New England stock, and those early years of mental molding and muscle-training in which all after life is shapened were passed in my own State. And he had hardly essayed the battle of life in that infant Commonwealth, to whose very existence my own State had contributed so much, that Kansas might almost be said to have sprung from the loins of Massachusetts, when he returned and chose from among my own neighbors one of her daughters to walk with him that pathway which the untried future was opening up before him.

By this transplanting the home life of Mr. HASKELL, and largely his public career, became an illustration of the effect of that broader horizon and freer spirit of pioneer experience upon the stern teachings and tough fiber which the Puritan and the Pilgrim wove into the character and stamped upon the forearm of each son of theirs wherever his foot rested. Indeed, the town of Lawrence, where he built his home, and where he now sleeps, does not bear a name more distinctly New England than it does a character whose basis and ruling color were brought over in the Mayflower, and which was, with precious little of latter-day polish or toning, taken bodily from Worcester and Middlesex in my own State to the sharp, quick, and bloody but final conflict for freedom of body and soul in a new empire. A New Englander, loyal to the stiff and stout qualities ingrain in her nature and proud of her aggressive spirit, dominated by an iron will on whatever soil it sets its stake, reads plainly enough in the just tributes paid to the marked qualities of this deceased statesman of what stuff this man was made when they recite the simple story that he was born in Vermont and was taken to Massachusetts in the first year of his life, and that a true descendant of the mingled colonies of Winthrop and Carver took him, when only eleven, with one hand and a Sharps rifle with the other, and with the Bible and a spelling-book in his pocket, led him forth to pitch his tent and assert his convictions on the plains of Kansas.

The founders of that State were not only heroes but far-seeing statesmen also. They made imperishable history, written in blood and in the living light of principle and of a duty to posterity, once and forever to be discharged. The youth of whom we speak, with only two or three more years of parental teaching and guidance, was by the death of his father pushed out alone to further equip himself as best he could and stand upon his own feet, and by the strength of his own arm to hew his own way through life. And yet it was not his own way he was to hew, for he never succeeded in laying up riches as the world counts riches, and died poor. But the life which was spared him was devoted to the public service. Here he planted and watered and reared and pruned, and those who come after him shall gather more wholesome fruit because he has lived.

Mr. HASKELL came into Congress a little more than six years ago. Nearly all that time the committee work which fell to my lot here brought me into frequent and intimate consultation and co-operation with him. I soon came to value his counsel and rely upon his judgment. This intimacy ripened into the friendship and attachment of associates and companions. In a common work devolved upon us by the two Houses respectively it was our pleasure to find ourselves working in harmony, moved by a common purpose toward a single end. Last August he had accepted my invitation to accompany a committee of this body charged with the duty of investigating certain phases of the Indian question among the Indians themselves. But failing health compelled him to turn away from this duty to medical treatment in a distant State, and I never saw him again.

I mourn to-day the death of a friend I could not spare, of a colaborer who can not be replaced, and I feel that those who need help, of whatever race and however bound or cast off, have lost a strong arm, ever stretched forth to succor; a clear intellect, ever alert, well balanced, and directed to the wisest methods, and a heart as big as his native hills, ever responsive to the appeal of the lowly. I see, but I can not comprehend the mystery of a well-ordered life full of earnestness and hope and promise, equipped for great exigencies and animated by lofty and noble aims, closed almost at the threshold and before the work men would have him to do had hardly been begun. Verily inscrutable are the ways of Him who holds in His hands the destiny of individuals and of nations.

And yet such a life, so brief, and to human sight so incomplete, is nevertheless of great value to the individual and the nation; to the individual as an example, and to the nation as a product. The power he was able to wield and the good he had time to accomplish were the reward of labor. Neither genius nor the graces of rhetoric nor the fascinations of oratory made him the able debater he was, but patient and thorough investigation, tireless labor, gave him the ability to sift out the kernel and blow away the chaff. He uttered thoughts, not words, and they seemed to come up from a deep well, always full. He had convictions, and he dealt in nothing else. It seemed to him a duty to convince others, not to push or carry them. Hence all he had to say was argument, often naked, never decked or adorned with flowers of rhetoric or figures of speech. There was no art or guile or stage effect in his oratory. If he had no reason for the faith that was in him, he did not trouble others with it. A clear, logical, and well-stored mind, an ardent temperament, and a profound conviction of the soundness of his position, gave him great power in debate and placed him in the first rank of efficient and reliable leaders in the House.

The whole biography of this man is written in a single word, fidelity, the noblest word after all in the English language. It was true of him in every trust of his life. He was true to himself and to all the faculties intrusted to him. He wrought with them all, and he strengthened and equipped them all for the best work attainable. He discharged to the uttermost every duty, public or private, and faithful to the end, he died at his post. It is thought by some that the labor he undertook exceeded his strength and hastened his death. If that be so, it would be worth far more, it seems to me, to leave the record of a life filled up beyond its measure and borne down with the weight of a too exhausting struggle than to leave an empty record of a life prolonged into weary and purposeless days of fruitless existence.

Mr. HASKELL was a product of our institutions all too rare in this day when place and power in the public service are so often sought and maintained by questionable means and for unworthy ends. He was not born to politics or place, but to poverty and privation. He did not belong to the class set apart when they were born for the public service and educated in the school of politics and in theories and ideals of government. He came, instead, of practical politics, and was himself a product of their needs. He became a builder, because he had himself handled the trowel and knew the quality of the mortar rather than the style of the architecture. Such men lay the foundations and build the walls, a little rough it may be, but still solid and abiding long after a more elegant finish shall have faded and perished. Our politics will suffer and our institutions will lose in rugged strength when such men fail of recognition and appreciation in the public service.

Our friend was in personal intercourse the true gentleman. He hated all pretense and was always what he appeared to be. If he was angry, he left no one in doubt; and when he extended his hand, every one knew that it was warm. No one was ever put on his guard by a smile or stood in fear of lurking hate. In social and in private life, as well as in public, he was direct, plain, and simple, and won a place in our hearts made desolate by this bereavement.

And now, Mr. President, we shall best profit from the lesson taught us by the character we have been contemplating if we turn from unavailing sorrow over the grave of a statesman we have honored and a friend we have loved, and, closing up our ranks, press on to the performance of that work in which he labored so faithfully while he was with us, mindful that the night soon cometh in which no man can work.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, it was my privilege to become acquainted with Hon. DUDLEY CHASE HASKELL soon after entering upon his duties as a member of the Forty-fifth Congress and to maintain this acquaintance during his Congressional career in the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, and Forty-seventh Congresses.

It is to me a sad pleasure to join in these last memorial services and to unite with those who knew him more intimately in all his personal and official relations in paying this last tribute to his memory, his personal worth, and faithful, exemplary performance of all his official duties.

DUDLEY CHASE HASKELL was born March 23, 1842, at Springfield, Vt., and was the first member of the Forty-eighth Congress summoned after the assembling from the scenes of his earthly labors to enter upon the realities of an unending existence beyond the grave. He was the descendant of an old Saxon family located in Scotland, and migrating to Salem, Mass., at an early period in the settlement of that place, and in his boyhood attended the common schools in New England. When 13 years old, in 1855, his parents located near Lawrence, Kans., where he attended the first common school taught in his town. In 1857 and 1858 he returned to Springfield, Vt., and attended school there.

Returning home, he was employed in the fall of 1858 and winter of 1859 in a clothing-store, and accompanied his employer to Colorado. In the fall of 1861 he was employed in the transportation department of the Union Army in Kansas, and so continued in 1862.

In January, 1863, he attended school at Easthampton, Mass., and in the fall of that year entered upon a special course at Yale College and took a course in a business college in New Haven in 1864. While at Easthampton he joined the Congregational Church, of which he remained a consistent and exemplary member up to his death, and there also formed the acquaintance of Miss Hattie M. Kelsey, whom he married in the fall of 1864, and then returned to Lawrence, Kans., and engaged in mercantile pursuits until elected to the Forty-fifth Congress.

In 1872, 1875, and 1876 he was a member of the State house of representatives, serving as speaker in the last term. In 1874 he was nominated for governor by the Temperance party of his State, but declined. He was elected a member of the Forty-fifth Congress, and successively elected to the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses. Such is a cursory review of his active outward life before the world.

Success being the test of merit, surely there was real merit in Mr. Haskell. He had not enjoyed the advantages and opportunities enjoyed by so many young men of our country, but he had carefully improved every opportunity for the cultivation and development of a sound body and vigorous mind, inherited from his worthy parents. He was the architect of his own fortune, and from the scant materials within his grasp builded wisely and skillfully the attractive fabric of a noble, intellectual, moral, and physical manhood. He was a true gentleman in the broadest sense. Life with him was real. He was of earnest purpose and strong convictions, sincere, steadfast, courageous, and persevering.

In his private life he was blameless and his character above reproach; a true friend, a dutiful son, a devoted and faithful husband, a tender and affectionate father, a true Christian, earnest and devoted to the cause and interests of his church and Christianity. In his business life he was upright, industrious, and attentive.

However engaged, he was a close student and diligent in the acquisition of information of a practical and useful character, such as would prepare him for the faithful and efficient performance of every duty and trust in life.

As a legislator his integrity was not questioned. Dignified in his bearing, commanding in his appearance, with a clear voice, well informed, ready in debate, careful of the interests of his constituents, and not offensively partisan, he was a model legislator.

In the debates in the Forty-seventh Congress he gained a national reputation by the force and ability with which he presented the views of his party on the tariff issues.

To show the high estimate entertained for him, I read the following editorial from the Washington Daily Post of December 17, 1883:

> Hon. DUDLEY C. HASKELL, of the second Kansas district, is the first member of the newly organized Congress to be summoned from his post of duty by death. He had been a member of the House for three successive terms, always the leading Representative from his own State, and always commanding more than ordinary respect upon the floor. In politics he was a Republican of the strictest sect, but not offensively partisan. As a legislator he was practical and conscientious, bringing to the support of his positions a wide range of information, undoubted courage, and a careful regard for the interests of his constituents. He had great ambition and the promise of a long life, but the higher aims of the one perish with the other, and it is to be regretted that a record so honorable was not permitted to reach its full-rounded completeness.

I also read an editorial from the National Republican of the same date:

> In the death of Hon. D. C. HASKELL, of Kansas, the House loses one of its brightest and most active members. In the tariff debates in the last Congress he showed himself to be singularly well informed in the details of the question at issue, and his ready grasp of great public interests won him undisputed rank among the leaders on the Republican side. Cut off in his prime by the unsparing reaper, his country is deprived of one whose future promised to be of great usefulness.

He was appreciated, honored, and loved by the good people of Lawrence and his adopted State, who knew him well and best, and among whom he had spent his boyhood and maturer years.

It was my privilege to attend his remains to their last resting place in the beautiful cemetery near his home, and to witness the evidences of admiration, honor, and love cherished for him by his neighbors and the people of his State. They were earnest and sincere, and manifested with genuine sympathy and tenderness by all classes—fitting tributes to the noble dead.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the tender and truthful tributes which have been already paid to the deceased leave little more for me to add.

Mr. HASKELL was born in Vermont; and this fact, perhaps, has brought to me the honor of an invitation to add a leaf here to the brief ceremonies of the hour in commemoration of our deceased friend who was last year among us, with all the robust and elastic vigor of health and ripe manhood, fitly representing a notable district of a great and prosperous State. He then stood as the equal of the foremost for his practical knowledge and unflagging industry in the discussion and arbitrament of the leading question of the day. Unfortunately, as it appears to us, his career has been suddenly closed—too suddenly for his family, or for his friends and country. No one familiar with the voluminous record of the recent tariff debate, with the ever-inhering difficulties and complicated problems of the subject, will hesitate to admit, whether agreeing to the principles he promulgated or not, that it has fallen to the lot of few men to approach more nearly at one session of Congress to the general mastery of the subject than was done by this laborious Representative from Kansas. Not that he appeared in long and eloquent orations and then retired from the field, but that he was at all times ready with the lucid explanations and apt speech of a well-equipped and strong man. His stalwart frame seemed to exempt him from brain-weariness. Strong as he appeared, it is now evident that his excessive labors were pursued at the peril of his health, and yet pursued with undiminished diligence and undiminished courage. He knew how to die, but not how to surrender.

Young HASKELL'S removal from the fine old and peaceful town of Springfield, in Vermont, to Kansas in the days of his boyhood, but when old and strong enough to shoulder a rifle in behalf of the free-State cause, brought him into a new arena of a more stirring and eventful life, which was well calculated to fire his heart and make him forever thoroughly earnest in the avowal and defense of his opinions. He was there to see the birth of a State and there to follow the flag of the Union in 1861.

His subsequent training at scientific schools and his later mercantile experience, if not leading him to the acquisition of personal wealth, led him to study deeply the most effective systematic methods by which the happiness and prosperity of great agricultural communities could be built up and solidly sustained. He had no faith in anything short of a home market and the harmony of diversified industries. There was nothing excellently done by labor elsewhere that he was not ambitious to have better done in America. He was justly proud of his adopted State, of its marvelous wealth-producing prairies, and full of faith in its liberty-loving people and in their rapidly growing numbers; but he would also have Kansas as much esteemed for all the virtues of a Christian State as for the fertility of its soil or the thrift of its people. As a leader at home he aimed, both by example and precept, to elevate the intelligence and purity of character as well as the material prosperity of his State; and here his life showed that he did not lose sight as a national legislator of the same ideal statesmanship. His political duties and religious faith were equally binding upon his conscience and never lacked harmonious relations.

In the committee of conference upon the tariff bill, during the closing days of the last Congress, an opportunity was afforded to me to notice some of the prominent traits in the character of Mr. HASKELL. He was true to his convictions, and lacked neither information nor courage to enforce them. He was outspoken in his opinions, but not dogmatic; and when overborne by the majority, which rarely happened, gracefully yielded. He seemed to recognize every interest of the country, however widely separated, as entitled to be heard with the most respectful consideration, and was not only ready but eager to offer equal justice to all. A patient listener to others, not soon tired by a review of the most unattractive details, his conclusions, always commanding respect, appeared to be based upon an unselfish adherence to the principles he regarded essential to the permanent advancement and greatest good of the whole country.

I bear willing testimony to his distinguished services; services which entitle his name to a loving remembrance not only by the citizens of Kansas and of his native State but by the nation. His place in the Congress of the United States, it is to be feared, will not soon be supplied, and his decease must be lamented not only by his friends as a personal bereavement, but by all those who were acquainted with his merits it must also be lamented as a national loss. Had he lived longer his reputation might have mounted higher. As it is, history, which remedilessly ignores the multitude of mankind, will not suffer his name to be forgotten. Henceforth the distinction he so fairly earned will remain secure in the annals of his country.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, respect for the dead is a pervading instinct of our common humanity. To honor the memory of the departed is regarded as a sacred trust, to the faithful discharge of which affection and friendship are irrevocably committed. Nor is any good man's fame and memory left to the sole guardianship of those who knew and loved him in life. There is something in the silent helplessness of the coffin and the sepulcher that appeals with peculiar and pathetic force to the chivalry of human nature. The discord of party passion, the conflict of individual interests, the fierce rivalry of personal ambitions, and all that is base and unworthy in the eager struggle for precedence and supremacy retire in silence from that presence whose mastery over the combined forces of nature is attested by the unnumbered dead of all the ages.

If these proceedings to-day were but a meaningless ceremony, if the public business had been suspended that we might take part in a mere empty pageant, we should do but scant honor to the memory of him whose early and lamented death is the theme of the occasion. Brought face to face with the sum and end of human hopes, so far as they center in this life, who shall say that the contemplation of that result may not guide us to loftier heights of purpose and effort, and by inspiring us with fresh zeal and devotion make us fitter for the time when we, too, shall be the text of funeral discourse?

The great State which honors me with a seat in this Chamber is in mourning. One of the ablest and most distinguished of her sons has fallen; for he was peculiarly a son of the State. His early youth was spent among the shifting and exciting incidents of her "uneasy civilization," and he broadened into manhood just as she was laying aside the insignia of Territorial vassalage for the nobler emblems of sovereignty. Thus with almost every step of her progress he had personal identification, and thus as the years advanced and the early honors conferred upon him were more than justified, the boundaries of his influence were enlarged and people who had never looked upon his face watched his career with pride from the remotest corners of the Commonwealth.

Others have told in fitting terms the life-story of my dead colleague and friend, and I need not retrace that ground.

It is a well-known fact in philosophy and experience that the characters of men and races are influenced and molded by their surroundings in the natural world. Strong natures, physical, intellectual, and moral, are nurtured under wintry skies and upon rugged soil. Mr. HASKELL carried with him to what was then the "Far West" the vigor and industry, the native shrewdness, and the force of character to give it scope and purpose, which he had imbibed with the air of his native hills. Of the traditions, purposes, and principles of New England he was at once the product and exemplar; and the little city which honored him in life and which now so keenly mourns his death bears a proud New England name, and boasts no small measure of those sterling qualities that have made New England homes and New England enterprise a theme of envy and a pattern for imitation.

Much has been said—too much can not be said—of the intellectual side of Mr. HASKELL'S nature and of the honor that he had proved himself worthy to wear and which he seemed destined speedily to win in the field of politics and statesmanship. But there are those among his old neighbors and scattered all over the State which he honored who will prefer to remember him as the faithful friend and vigilant ally of every useful, every noble work. To the temperance cause he gave an example of life-long abstemiousness and ever-ready advocacy. In the Sabbath-school he was a patient, zealous, untiring worker. He honored religion by a blameless life, and strengthened the church of his choice by the earnestness of his labors and the elevating influence of his character. In social life he was fit to be a leader, and as the head of that sadly stricken family he was worthy of all the measureless love that centered there.

Mr. HASKELL was an ambitious man, but his was the ambition to excel, and thus to build upon the solid foundation of his own merits. He had none of the arts of the demagogue, and to the trickeries and littlenesses of politics he was an absolute stranger. He appealed for support on grounds of principle and the highest party expediency, and in his popular addresses eschewed charlatanism and personalities. He fortified himself for his public efforts by study and labor, and was thereby enabled to illumine them with a wealth of illustration and a profusion of analogies.

He gave to whatever he undertook the enthusiasm of his nature—not that tidal enthusiasm as conspicuous in its ebb as in its flow, but that steady, ardent, genial force before which obstacles that might withstand the fury of a spasmodic assault gradually but surely disappear.

Strong in his purposes, unyielding in his convictions, insensible to fear, vigorous in assault, and skillful in defense, Mr. HASKELL combined the chivalry of the knight with the tenderness of a woman. He contributed to partisanship no malignity, but was tolerant of differences and was a sincere admirer of able and conspicuous political opponents.

Mr. HASKELL'S power of concentration was something remarkable. If others excelled him in range and variety of information, he was the equal of any in the capacity to summon all his faculties to the attack or defense of a single position. He was therefore able to give to any undertaking in which he engaged all the energies of his nature. "Thorough" was his motto, and when he espoused a cause he studied it minutely, with a view to determine how it might be the most signally promoted and the most successfully defended.

This devotion to the matter in hand, whether great or small, was a striking characteristic of his whole life. His wholesome, hearty nature delighted in manly sports, and during his college life and subsequently the amiable ardor of his temperament was not less conspicuous in the athletic and chivalrous pastimes of the day than in the more serious concerns of life.

No man less obnoxious to the suspicion of being influenced by improper considerations ever lived. A prominent figure in numerous heated political controversies and a champion whose blows were as harmful to opponents as they were helpful to allies, no whisper of personal reproach was ever breathed against him. In an atmosphere of political perturbation and unrest he was serene and guileless, advancing toward the end in view in the sunlight and by processes seen and known of all men. To what he conceived to be vicious notions of finance and economic administration he gave no countenance, but fearlessly and sturdily maintained his own convictions at every hazard of personal popularity.

His courtesy was as sincere and cordial as it was plain and artless.

He cultivated no grace at the expense of his sincerity, nor simulated a pleasure that he did not feel. He had no special deference for rank or wealth or station, but was as kindly to the lowly who implored his aid as to the proud who sought his counsel. The kindliness of his soul beamed through mild blue eyes, and was traced in lines of tenderness upon his expressive countenance.

Mr. HASKELL was emphatically a growing man. The occasion would not justify invidious comparisons, nor is extravagant eulogy the office of true friendship; but I venture the opinion that no man of his age in public life gave fairer promise of eminent usefulness, or could more justly look forward to the recognition and reward to which genuine merit is ever entitled to aspire.

For the first time in the history of Kansas death has invaded the circle of her representation present at the capital of the nation. The blow which came with unexpected suddenness to anxious friends here fell with stunning force upon tens of thousands of hearts in distant homes. The aspiring mind and noble soul of my colleague were domiciled in a physical organization that seemed especially designed to give them fitting shelter. He was regarded as a strong man in every sense, and his friends and admirers were justified in anticipating for him length of days as well as fullness of honors. What commentary on the mutability of human affairs and the perishable nature of human hopes could be more sadly impressive!

No matter what may be the nature of the consolations left to the survivors, an ended life, whether it be that of the infant or the patriarch, is ever a matter of serious contemplation. It is peculiarly and sadly so when in that life centered brilliant hopes and extensive possibilities. To his latest hours of consciousness my dead colleague looked out upon the world as upon a field in which adequate rewards are reserved for conscientious labor. He was confident in his own capacity, and meditated large plans of usefulness.

And so DUDLEY CHASE HASKELL came to the close of his too brief career at a time grievously premature to his country and to his friends, but under circumstances not wanting in precious consolations. He had so lived as not to fear death. A laggard in the race for wealth, he had gained a richer inheritance; and, dying, left the partner of his life and home dowered with the fragrance of an exemplary life, and his children rich in the patrimony of his stainless name.

Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The resolutions were agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 3, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

REBATE OF TOBACCO TAX.

Mr. RANDALL. Under instructions from the Committee on Appropriations, I report back a letter referred to that committee in relation to rebate of tax on tobacco; and in that connection I desire, after the letter shall be read, to make two short statements.

The SPEAKER. The letter will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 28, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution passed by the House of Representatives on the 25th instant, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to the House of Representatives within what period of time the rebates of tobacco tax under the act of March —, 1883, will be paid to the claimants, and if there is to be any delay in making such payment, then the causes thereof, and what can be done to effect the more speedy payment thereof."

In answer thereto I have to say that there are about 48,000 rebate claims and about 6,000 stamp-redemption claims under the act mentioned, all of which require examination in the office of the First Comptroller; that I have detailed eight clerks to the duty of examining said claims, and will increase the number. The services of those detailed, or that of others equivalent thereto, will be devoted to the work until it is completed. I shall also direct the Comptroller to increase the number of hours of duty of the clerks employed on the work.

It is estimated that with the details of clerks and the increase of hours all the claims can be examined and disposed of, and those allowed paid, in about three months.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, statements have been made in this House based on letters received by members of Congress and two resolutions have been offered in relation to this matter. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Folger, settles one or two points. First, that no additional force is necessary; and second, instead of taking three years, as has been stated publicly, for the payment of these claims, that it will take but three months.

There has also crept into public notice an intimation that persons having claims, by the employment of agents at 5 per cent. on the amounts involved, could get precedence. Now, I want to say to the House and to the claimants, there is no occasion for them to go to any expense whatever to secure the payment of this money, and that if they do employ agents after this statement they do it of their own volition and not from any governmental standpoint.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the letter reported from the committee will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

JEANNETTE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution for present consideration; and at the same time I send to the desk the memorial on which the resolution is based.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas a petition has been presented to the honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives respectfully representing the condition of the Jeannette Arctic expedition, and the conduct of the surviving members, and the manner of the investigation adopted by the naval court of inquiry under the joint resolution of Congress providing for the same; and inasmuch as said facts involve the honor and humanity of officers in the United States service, as well as a proper respect for those who perished in the expedition; and inasmuch as the naval court of inquiry refused to admit or allow, as it is alleged, valuable testimony to be given to bring out the facts of the case in the interest of truth and history: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House be directed to investigate the facts connected with said expedition and the alleged unofficer-like and inhumane conduct therein, and that the said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Minnesota that there is no provision for defraying the expenses from the contingent fund; and under the decision of the Comptroller the expenses could not be paid out of the contingent fund unless the resolution contained that provision.

Mr. WASHBURN. I thought if the committee went on with the investigation they could ask for that afterward.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will have the petition in this case put in the RECORD.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the petition on which this resolution is based be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The petition is as follows:

SIR: Your petitioner would respectfully submit the following memorial in reference to the Jeannette Arctic expedition, to the manner such expedition was conducted, the conduct of the surviving members, and the manner of investigation adopted by the naval court of inquiry under the joint resolution of Congress providing for the same:

First. That in the month of July, 1879, Jerome J. Collins, then a citizen of the United States, and director of the New York Herald weather service, joined the United States Arctic steamer Jeannette in the capacity of meteorologist and correspondent of the New York Herald.

Second. That on and after the month of September, 1879, the said Jerome J. Collins was, with other members of the expedition, treated with every indignity and outrage, even to being deprived of all the scientific instruments and appliances of his position as meteorologist of the expedition; that he was prevented from performing the proper work and duties of his office.

Third. That on or about the end of the year 1879, and while the Arctic steamer Jeannette was held in the ice, the said Jerome J. Collins was placed under suspension or arrest by the commanding officer of the expedition, and that he remained so until he died of starvation and cold on the bank of the River Lena, in Northern Siberia.

Fourth. That during the month of June, 1881, the Arctic steamer Jeannette, at that time held fast and drifting with the ice, was crushed and sunk, and the officers and crew, in three parties, commenced their retreat southward toward the Siberian coast; that one party, under the command of Lieutenant Chipp, U. S. N., was never found, and is supposed to have perished during a great storm, with his companions; that another party, under the command of Lieut. G. W. De Long, U. S. N., landed on the Lena delta, and traveled along the line of the river, hoping to find a settlement and relief; that at last, the party having consumed their last food and being threatened with starvation, Lieutenant De Long sent two of his party ahead to find assistance; that the two men so sent, Nindemann and Noros, traveled ahead until found by natives in a frozen and starving condition; that the party under the command of Lieutenant De Long, failing to find natives and supplies, and receiving no word from Nindemann and Noros, the party, including Lieutenant De Long, Mr. Jerome J. Collins, Dr. Ambler, and the seamen, died from starvation and cold during the last days of the month of October, 1881.

Fifth. That the third party, under the command of Chief Engineer Melville, United States Navy, after weathering the storm, did, on the 26th day of September, 1881, find a place of safety, and a base of supplies, several of the members of the party being at this time in a disabled condition. That the records show that, on the 3d day of October following, the said Melville had fully recovered, and with him all his men, and that several of the party urged him to push ahead and not delay, several volunteering to go in search of their missing shipmates. That finally, about the middle of the month of October, the said Melville sent an ignorant exile named Kusmah, resident in that place, to Bulun, refusing permission to any of the party to accompany him. That neither at this time nor at any subsequent period up to the 29th day of October did said Melville, he being then in command, use any effort or means to obtain information as to the condition or location of the two missing parties. That even at the time Melville sent the exile Kusmah to Bulun, he gave no directions or adopted no means for spreading the news of the missing boats, although surviving members of the expedition claim that the said Melville knew the route De Long would take in his retreat down the river Lena. That the exile Kusmah, sent to Bulun, returned on the 29th day of October, bringing a message from Nindemann and Noros stating that the captain's (De Long's) party were in a starving condition and in need of immediate assistance; at that the said Melville then, after delaying thirty-three days at Gloomvialocke without making any efforts to succor his comrades, at last went to the rescue, it is alleged, stating that they would be all dead. That the evidence offered to the naval court, and which the undersigned is prepared to furnish, and that has already and will be further given by the survivors, goes to show, beyond any reasonable doubt, that had the said Melville performed the duty devolving upon him as the commander of the party, and obeyed the directions given him by Lieutenant De Long to immediately communicate with the Russian authorities, and gone to the rescue and conducted a search for the captain's party, each and every member of that party, with the exception of Erickson, would have been rescued and alive to-day.

Sixth. That on and after the arrival of a number of survivors of the expedition in this country a joint resolution was passed by Congress directing the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a court of inquiry into the loss of the Arctic steamer Jeannette and the conduct of the officers and men; that the said naval court refused to admit or allow to be given valuable testimony, and that said court ruled out nearly every question that would bring out the true history of the expedition; that many of the survivors were not permitted to give their full and free testimony, and that the naval inquiry was so conducted that all possible chance or possibility of the truth coming out was destroyed; that many of the witnesses, it is alleged by competent authority, were at the time dependent upon, under the jurisdiction of, and afraid of the persecution of the Naval Department; that the official stenographer of the court publicly declared in writing that important and valuable testimony was suppressed, and that the proceedings of said court were calculated to cover up all matters relating to the expedition.

Respectfully,

DANIEL F. COLLINS, M. D.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

PACIFIC NATIONAL BANK, BOSTON, MASS.

Mr. COLLINS. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas a memorial has been presented to this Congress by the shareholders of the Pacific National Bank of Boston, Mass., charging frauds and misconduct on the part of certain United States Government officials in combination with the directors of said bank:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency consider the expediency of making an immediate investigation of said charges and of so amending the banking laws as to prevent such frands and misconduct in future.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. COLLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COLLINS. I ask that the memorial on which the resolution is based be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered. The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the United States, respectfully represent that they are shareholders in and creditors of the Pacific National Bank, a bank organized under the laws of the United States, and formerly doing business in Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, with a capital of $500,000; that on the 13th day of September, A. D. 1881, the directors of said bank voted to increase the capital by adding thereto $500,000, so as to make the capital of said bank $1,000,000, and invited the shareholders of said bank to take said increased capital, and pay for the same on or before October 1, 1881; that some of your memorialists paid their money to said bank for certain shares of said $500,000 of increased capital, under the provisions of the banking laws, which require that the whole of such increased capital shall be paid in before the bank shall be allowed to do business upon such increase; that on the 18th day of November, 1881, the said bank became unable to pay the legal demands upon it, and from that time was under the control of Daniel Needham, a bank examiner under the laws of the United States, and appointed by John J. Knox, Comptroller of the Currency; that said Daniel Needham had been the Government examiner of said bank from the time it began business until its suspension as aforesaid, and continued to be such examiner of said bank until said bank was placed in the hands of a receiver; that prior to said 18th day of November, 1881, the date of said bank's suspension, only $461,300 of the $500,000 increased capital had been paid in, and no more than said $461,300 was ever paid in on account of such increased capital; that John J. Knox, Comptroller of the Currency, well knew that only said $461,300 had been paid in, and informed the directors of said bank, immediately after said bank's suspension, that the capital of said bank was only $500,000; that the said John J. Knox, Comptroller of the Currency, in concert with said directors, and without the knowledge or consent of the shareholders of said bank, or of the parties who had paid in said $461,300 on account of said $500,000 increased capital, on the 12th day of December, 1881, advised said directors to vote to reduce the capital, which they had voted to increase by $500,000, to the amount actually paid in as aforesaid on account of said $500,000, to wit, to the amount of $461,300; that when said directors had voted as said John J. Knox had advised, but without the knowledge of the shareholders or of the persons who had paid in said $461,300 on account of said increase of $500,000, and when said directors had thus illegally reduced said increased capital, and had voted, also illegally, to increase the capital of said bank by said amount of $461,300 actually paid in, said John J. Knox, Comptroller of the Currency, illegally consented to said increase of capital last aforesaid, so illegally made, about one month after said bank had become insolvent; that the said Knox, knowing that said bank was insolvent, issued to said bank and to said directors a certificate permitting and authorizing said last-mentioned illegal increase of capital, thus aiding and abetting said directors in their fraudulent attempt to change the relations of those who had paid in their money on account of a portion of said increased capital of $500,000 from that of creditors of said bank to that of shareholders therein, without their knowledge or consent, and thus appropriating their money to the payment of other creditors of the bank, and attempting thereby to defraud them still further by making them liable as shareholders to an assessment of 100 per cent. upon said fraudulently increased capital for the purpose of paying the other creditors of the bank. That on the 10th day of January, A. D. 1882, at a meeting of the shareholders of said bank, said Daniel Needham, as such bank examiner, stated to said shareholders that said bank could be made solvent and could resume business if said shareholders would vote to assess 100 per cent. on the shares of said bank; and the president of said bank, one Lewis Coleman, and the agent of said Daniel Needham and of said Lewis Coleman and of the other directors, one William J. Best, in concert with and in the presence and hearing of said Daniel Needham, made statements to the same effect; and said Needham, Coleman, and Best assured said shareholders that if they would vote and pay such assessment they would save all the amount so paid in and from 25 to 50 per cent. of the par value of their shares; that said Needham, Coleman, and Best, for the purpose of enforcing their statements and advice, procured speeches to be made to said shareholders, to the same effect, by sundry persons who pretended to act for the advantage and benefit of the shareholders, whereas they were in collusion with the said directors and said Needham and Best, to induce the shareholders to vote and pay such assessment, so that they, said colluding parties, might be paid their claims as depositors in or creditors of said bank; that said vote to assess the capital stock of said bank 100 per cent. was passed by the shareholders, incited by and believing in the false statements aforesaid of said Daniel Needham, Lewis Coleman, William J. Best, and said parties colluding with them; and said Coleman and Best and said colluding parties, and Edmund C. Whitney, who had been appointed cashier of said bank by said directors, continually repeated to the shareholders and others the statements made January 10, 1882, to induce said shareholders and others to pay such assessment, all of said parties named and described well knowing at the time they made and repeated such statements that they were false and that the bank was hopelessly insolvent, and would be insolvent even though the whole of the sum assessed, to wit, $961,300, were paid in, and there was paid in on account of such assessment the amount of $742,800. That on the 18th day of March, 1882, said Daniel Needham, as such bank examiner, in charge of said bank by the authority of said John J. Knox, and with the official consent of said John J. Knox, permitted and authorized said bank to resume business, and thereby represented to the shareholders, to your memorialists, and to the public that said bank was solvent and able to pay all its debts, and the said bank did resume business and continued to do business until the 20th day of May, 1882, when it again suspended business, being insolvent and unable to pay the legal demands upon it, and was soon thereafter placed by said John J. Knox, as Comptroller of the Currency, in the hands of Linus M. Price, of New Jersey, as receiver thereof; that the said bank has been found by said Price to be hopelessly insolvent, and to have been insolvent at and long before the 13th day of September, 1881, when said directors voted to increase the capital by $500,000, and on the 18th day of November, 1881, and on the 13th day of December, 1881, when said Knox authorized said directors fraudulently to increase the capital thereof as aforesaid, by adding thereto the $461,300 paid in on account of the increase of $500,000, and on the 18th day of March, 1882, when said Needham and said Knox authorized said bank to resume business and to hold itself out to the public as sound and solvent; and your memorialists aver that said Needham and said Knox knew, or were bound officially to know, that said bank was insolvent at the different dates aforesaid, and were bound by their offices to do no act, official or otherwise, which should tend to deceive the shareholders or the public or to change or affect in any way the existing relations between any of the various parties interested in the affairs of said bank.

And your memorialists further say that said Knox, as Comptroller as aforesaid, has ordered an assessment of 100 per cent. upon what he now claims to be the capital of the bank, to wit, $961,300, including therein the $461,300 paid in on account of the $500,000 increased capital before the first suspension of the bank, but which would not have been included therein without the illegal action of said Knox as aforesaid; that the said Price has commenced suits against the shareholders to compel them to pay said assessment.

And your memorialists respectfully represent that they, and all the shareholders and the innocent creditors of said bank, have been greatly injured and defrauded by the directors of said bank and their agents as aforesaid; that said Daniel Needham, before the first suspension of said bank, aided and abetted said directors, by his culpable neglect of duty if not by positive acts, in defrauding said shareholders and creditors; and that said Needham and said Knox aided the said directors in defrauding said shareholders and creditors—the said Knox by authorizing the illegal increase of capital after said bank was known by him to be insolvent, and the said Needham by the assurances he made personally, and those made by said Coleman, Best, and others, which he approved and sanctioned at the shareholders' meeting on the 10th of January, 1882; and, notwithstanding said misconduct in and unfitness for the office, said Daniel Needham has been retained by said Knox in said office of bank examiner until the present time. And your memorialists respectfully represent that the affairs of said bank, both before its first suspension and afterward up to this time, have been conducted in a manner which is a reproach to the banking system of the country, to the reputation of the officers of the Government, as well as a grievous injury to the shareholders and creditors of the bank.

Wherefore your memorialists respectfully pray that you will cause an investigation to be made of the affairs of said bank and of the conduct of the Government officers in connection therewith, in order that the banking laws may be so amended as to prevent, as far as possible, the recurrence of such frauds and misconduct, and to protect the interests of shareholders and creditors of national banks, and to make those who commit such acts as have been set forth civilly and criminally responsible therefor.

Mr. HOLMES. I think it should go to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, as a bill on the same subject was so referred.

Mr. KASSON. I understand the bill was reported back by the Committee on Railways and Canals and referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER. The bill was reported from the Committee on Railways and Canals, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is now on the Calendar.

Mr. KASSON. In that case this had better go there.

The resolution was refered to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and, upon request of Mr. HOLMES, by unanimous consent, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial and joint resolution relative to the construction of a canal from the Mississippi River to the Illinois River at Hennepin, in the State of Illinois.

Whereas the question of cheap transportation by an uninterrupted water route between the Mississippi River and the Atlantic seaboard, by way of the great lakes, has long been one of all-absorbing interest to the people of the food-producing States of the Northwest; and

Whereas the General Assembly of Iowa has repeatedly memorialized Congress for the construction of such water route; and expressly did, by memorial and joint resolution approved February 24, 1876, urge upon Congress the construction of the same from some point on the Mississippi River between the mouth of Rock River and Clinton, Iowa, to the Illinois River at Hennepin; and

Whereas at a convention representing the people of the Mississippi Valley and the Northwest, held at the city of Davenport, Iowa, May 25, 1881, it was resolved and unanimously declared—

First. That the Congress of the United States should devise by law and sustain by liberal and efficient appropriations a system of cheap transportation by water routes, connecting the Mississippi River and its tributaries with the Eastern Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf of Mexico.

Second. That it has been the policy of Congress and the desire of the people of the Northwest for many years to inaugurate and complete a system of water-channel improvement, having the Mississippi for its base; that to give greater efficiency to this policy there should be constructed from the Mississippi River, on the most feasible route, to the Illinois River at Hennepin, and thence to the lake at Chicago, a canal adequate to the present and future transportation needs of that great port of internal improvement, is an imperative necessity for a relief from excessive freight rates on the produce and commerce of the country, and that the work so long needed should immediately be commenced; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States, by act of August 2, 1882, authorized the Secretary of War to cause a survey to be made for the purpose of ascertaining the most practicable route for such proposed canal, which survey has been made, and an official report thereof transmitted to the Congress; and

Whereas the President of the United States, on the 8th day of January, 1884, sent to Congress his special message with respect to the construction of said Hennepin Canal, and accompanying said message with copies of the act of the General Assembly of Illinois, ceding to the United States the Illinois and Michigan Canal and other documents, in which special message the President says:

"I submit the communication of the governor of the State of Illinois, with a copy of the act of the General Assembly of the State, tendering to the United States the cession of the Illinois and Michigan Canal upon condition that it be enlarged and maintained as a national water way for commercial purposes. The proposed cession is an element of the subject Congress had under consideration in directing by the act of August 2, 1882, a survey for a canal from a point on the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin by the most practicable route to the Mississippi River at or above the city of Rock Island, the canal to be not less than seventy feet wide at the water line, and not less than seven feet depth of water, with a capacity for vessels of at least two hundred and eighty tons, and also for a survey of the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the estimated cost of enlarging it to the dimensions of the proposed canal between Hennepin and the Mississippi River. The surveys ordered in the above act have been completed and the report upon them included in the last annual report of the Secretary of War, and a copy is herewith submitted. It appears from these papers that the estimated yield of corn, wheat, and oats for 1882 in the States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, and Nebraska was more than 1,000,000,000 bushels. It is claimed that if a cheap water-transportation route, which is now continuous from the Atlantic Ocean to Chicago, is extended to the upper Mississippi by such a canal great benefit in the reduction of freight charges would result to the people of the upper Mississippi Valley, whose productions I have only partly noted, not only on their own shipments but upon the articles of commerce used by them, which are now taken from the Eastern States by water only as far as Chicago. As the matter is of great interest, especially to the citizens in that part of the country, I commend the general subject to your consideration.

"CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

"EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 8, 1884."

Whereas it appears by the official report of Maj. W. H. H. Benyaurd, of the United States engineers, by whom such survey was made, that three routes were surveyed, to wit, the "Marais d'Osier route," "Watertown route," and "Rock Island route:" Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to vote for and use their active influence to effect such legislation by Congress as will secure the construction at an early day of said canal upon such route as may be the most feasible and practicable, and so designated by the Secretary of War, and which will be for the best interests of the people at large, and to vote a liberal appropriation therefor, to the end that said canal may be completed and opened to the commerce of the country at the earliest possible date.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, instructed to forthwith transmit a copy hereof to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
Des Moines, Iowa, February 26, 1884.

A true copy of a memorial passed by the twentieth General Assembly, now in session.

Mr. KASSON. In attempting to follow this bill as read, I find that it does not conform to the printed bill. I wish to ask whether the bill read at the desk is in print.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to say to the gentleman from Iowa that the bill just read embraces the principal features—substantially all the principles, in fact—of the bill reported by the Committee on Pensions and the bill introduced by myself. I will add that the bill is confined exclusively to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war.

The SPEAKER. The bill appears to be a manuscript bill.

Mr. KASSON. Has the bill been reported by a committee or is it presented on the gentleman's own responsibility?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is presented upon my individual motion. I repeat, it applies exclusively to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, this is in substance a bill which has already been made a special order; but the Clerk has read only portions of the bill, leaving out one or two sections. Is it in order to consider such a bill under a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to suspend all rules in order to put the bill on its passage. The motion requires a two-thirds vote. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In order to correct the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE]——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know that; but I want to correct an erroneous impression——

The SPEAKER. But debate is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to answer the parliamentary inquiry put by the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. That is debate, and the regular order is demanded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Indiana is mistaken, that is all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] will please act as tellers. The question is, Shall the motion to suspend the rules be seconded?

The tellers took their places; but before the count was concluded,

Mr. TOWNSHEND said: The gentleman from Indiana withdraws the objection to having a second ordered by unanimous consent.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. My only object in calling for a second was that time for discussion might be assured.

The SPEAKER. The ordering of a second by unanimous consent does not interfere with the time for debate. The objection being withdrawn, a second will be considered as ordered. Under the rules thirty minutes will now be allowed for debate on this motion, fifteen minutes in support of the motion and fifteen minutes in opposition to it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], who makes the motion, will control the fifteen minutes in support of the bill, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] who, as the Chair understood, rose first to demand a second will control the time on the other side.

Mr. KASSON. If in order I ask before the debate begins, as the bill is in manuscript and it is only fair, that it be again read for the information of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope that will be done.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. My friend from Alabama and myself demanded a second. Do I understand the gentleman from Alabama as opposing the bill in toto? If so, I will not object to his controlling the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do I understand the gentleman from Alabama to oppose the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen from Indiana has propounded an inquiry to the Chair.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not understand the gentleman from Alabama is opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule of the House the Chair will award the time in opposition to the bill to some gentleman really opposed to the measure, if the Chair can be made aware of that fact. No amendment can be offered except by unanimous consent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to know who does control the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois controls the time in favor of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But who controls the time in opposition to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois controls the time in support of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But who in opposition to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is endeavoring to ascertain.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am entirely willing the gentleman from Alabama shall control the time in opposition to the bill, and indeed I will be pleased if he would do so; but let us have somebody who is really opposed to the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not understand the gentleman from Alabama to oppose it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is not in order. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I wish to say this, Mr. Speaker, that while I expect to vote for the motion, I desire very much to say a few words on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair under the rule must award the control of the time to some gentleman opposed to the bill. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] therefore will control the time in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask unanimous consent to move a slight amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. No amendment can be offered to the bill except by unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. Let us have the bill read, as it is in manuscript.

The SPEAKER. The bill will again be read, and gentlemen will resume their seats, so that it may be heard.

The bill was again reported.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] as entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes in support of the motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, the bill which has been read, so far as it relates to the surviving soldiers of the Mexican war, is a combination of the essential features of a bill introduced by myself on the first bill day of this session and the bill reported from the Committee on Pensions, together with the suggestions made by the convention of Mexican soldiers at their recent convention in this city.

It does not contain a single essential provision not already sanctioned by a vote of the House of Representatives, and which has not been favorably reported from the Committee on Pensions. The bill, so far as it relates to the Mexican soldiers—it relates alone and exclusively to those who served in the Mexican war—is of the same nature substantially, term for term, as the bill which passed the House by unanimous consent in the Forty-fourth Congress. The bill, as I have said a moment ago, relates exclusively to those who served in the Mexican war. It is also confined in its provisions to those widows who were married to those soldiers prior to their discharge. The bill also, by the last provision in it, excludes from its benefits all those under political disabilities, or, in other words, excludes them while their political disabilities exist.

Mr. DUNN. How much do I understand that to mean?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It embraces the same clause found in the bill reported by the Committee on Pensions, excluding all persons while under political disability. It applies to one in particular who has never asked that his political disabilities be removed. In order that no misunderstanding may occur, I repeat that this bill is substantially the bill reported by the Committee on Pensions in the present Congress, with the exception that it does not include those provided for in that bill who participated in several Indian wars.
